(g) Among the systems offering an explanation of the world in terms of the Logos there are, finally, the mystery religions. These cultic communities did not see their task as lying in the communication of knowledge of a scientific nature, but of mysteries to their initiates who strove for purification in the recurrent enactment of sacred actions (cf. G. Wagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries, 1967). The foundation for the cultic actions was sacred texts (hieroi logoi, already thus in Hdt., 2, 51), revealed by the founder of the cult or by men inspired by the divinity on the basis of a → revelation. Among them were the cult of Dionysus, the Pythagoreans and the Orphic mysteries. By means of these cults, non-Gk. (primarily Egyptian) theological speculations influenced Gk. thought, such as in the Isis-Osiris mysteries, in which Osiris, the logos created by Isis, is the spiritual → image of the world (Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride 54). Similarly in the cult of Hermes, the latter informed his son Tat (an Egyptian name) in the “sacred text” belonging to the cult how by God’s mercy he became logos and thus a son of God (hyios theou). As such, he brought regulations and form into the world, but himself remained a mediating being between God and matter on the one side, and God and man on the other. The logos can also however appear as the son of Hermes, resulting in a triple gradation: God (Zeus), Son (Hermes), logos.

3. Usage in Grammar, Logic and Rhetoric. (a) Apart from its use in formulations of general interpretations of the world, the word logos is used with striking precision in the field of grammar. One of the examples of definition transmitted under Plato’s name (Plato, Definitiones 414d) is the following: “logos is a sound representable in written characters, which is able to express everything that exists, a discourse composed of substantives and verbs in the field of prose” (translation by H. Leisegang, “Logos”, Pauly-Wissowa, III 1037). logos is thus here set over against the Homeric concept, in line with the basic general Gk. meaning and set in the realm of (in particular, non-poetic) discourse. The word denotes a higher totality composed of levels made up of parts varying in size (letters, i.e. the basic elements, and words, the latter chosen qualitatively as being the words which constitute a sentence). Its possibilities for use are limitless. The formulation of this element-doctrine of the Logos is ascribed to the Atomists. Plato worked with it, and the doctrine initiates the development first to grammatical science, the teaching of sentence-analysis, and secondly to metaphysics, the teaching of the “logical” shape of the cosmos. (The word “logical” first appears in the Stoa.) By contrast with epos and lexis, logos is meaningful discourse.

(b) When the defence of mutually contradictory theses became the chief occupation of Sophistic philosophers, it became clear that anyone who wished to argue well and unassailably could not forgo a knowledge of grammar. Plato had realized that it was possible to form such opinions only when the existence of the object of the discussion could be asserted. For this, however, one needed a sentence, i.e. a combination of noun and verb; and such a sentence, i.e. a meaningful association of words, is in Plato called logos (cf. Soph. 262a).

Aristotle systematized this use of logos in making judgments in that he first of all investigated the words in themselves, before placing them in a meaningful context: there are the "categories". In themselves they have no meaning, i.e. for Aristotle, in the realm of logic, there is no such thing as the logos of a word. But since it is the sentence which gives the individual word its sense and defines its limits of meaning, logos comes to mean the definition (Met. 7p, 1012a, 23; prepared for in Plato, Rep. 343a). Thirdly, alongside judgment and definition, logos for him means the conclusion, i.e. the final proposition of a line of argumentation (syllogism) which concludes the proof. A logos is a conclusion when, if something is posited, various other things of necessity follow from what is posited by virtue of the fact that it is the case (Analytica 1, 1p, 24b, 18, translation by Leisegang, op. cit., 1042). Finally, logos means the proof itself, so that the main points of a logical argument – judgment, definition, conclusion, proof – can be expressed both in Aristotle and subsequently in later logicians by the word logos. After Aristotle, Gk. philosophy did not again take great interest in the strictly logical shape of the word logos.

(c) If grammar is the science of the analysis of sentences (logoi, because meaningful), and if knowledge of it is necessary in order to argue logically, then it is inevitable that the art of rhetoric, in which this takes place, will also have to work with the idea of logos. For Gorgias, poetry, speeches in court and philosophical disputations are all equally logoi, now in verse, now under the imposed conditions of competition, now as controversies. The conflict arose over the different areas of competence of orators and philosophers: logos for the orator meant continuous discourse, for the philosopher dialogue. So, slowly, the dialogue took over as the stylistic form of the philosophers, the logos as the stylistic form of the orators. Plato is acquainted with both, but introduces also the entirely new so-called maieutic dialogue, or the Socratic dialogue, as it is now chiefly called (the term comes from Aristotle, Poet. 1447b, 11). This logos, the name of which is borrowed from midwifery, is characterized by the way that the one who engages in maieutic discussion does not wish to procure a victory for his own thesis (he does not even need to have one), but desires by his questioning to unearth the knowledge which may well be present in his partner, although he himself may not yet be conscious of it. From this form of dialogue the philosophical dialogue evolved, appearing among the Stoics as a sub-group of logic, and generally designated as dialectic.

4. The apparently bewildering overall picture of the use of logos fits together intelligibly, if we note that the word was used as human discourse with an eye to content – implying, however, objectivity and thereby conformity – in order to establish one's mastery of the presumed regularity of the world. This is of course only true of those philosophers who were ready to argue from man to the world; but because of the strength of these systems the effect of these thinkers far exceeded that of the remaining representatives of Gk. philosophy. To the same extent that the conviction of the order of the world (logos) was to be conveyed in a lecture (logos) to a sceptical audience, a speaker sharpened his appreciation of the particular choice and combination of various words (logos), their logical validity, and their power to convince (logos). Thus the speaker, who was able to convince his hearers with a carefully-constructed discourse (logos), was able to reap success.

One can also understand how the individual sciences (grammar, logic, rhetoric), the necessary means to this end, had already reached perfection in the 4th cent. B.C., because they were accessible to observation and systematic control, while the struggle for knowledge of the totality of the world was in flux far longer. It is worthy of note that, thanks not least to new basic assumptions from non-Gk. traditions of thought apparent from the time of the Stoics onwards, it was still possible to summon up the energy for a closed system in the 3rd cent. A.D. G. Fries

OT 1. Heb. Terms for Word. The Heb. equivalent for logos is predominantly dāḇār, word, but not infrequently ʿemer, word (cf. ʿamar, to say), ʿimrāh, word, saying, and millāh, word. Since dāḇār is also rendered by → rhēma in the LXX, it is important to make the statistical observation that in the OT historical books logos is the predominant rendering, while in the prophets rhēma predominates by as much as eight-fold. The vb. legō stands chiefly for ʿamar, to speak, to say, dāḇār means word, report, command, but also thing, matter, affair and (linked with adjs.) something (dāḇār raʿ; something evil, Deut. 17:1; dāḇār gādōl, something great, 1 Sam. 20:2). It follows from the double structure of dāḇār – the meanings “word” and “thing” – that in the word there is always contained something of the thing itself, that the thing itself is only ever accessible in the word, and that the word cannot be separated from its content nor the content from the word.

The term “word of Yahweh” (dʿḇar YHWH) is found 241 times in the OT. The way in which these passages are distributed among the individual books (e.g. Jer. 52, Ezek. 60 times), the observation that the expression “word of Yahweh” is used substantially more often in the prophetic epoch than in any previous or later time, and the fact that 221 of all the OT occurrences (i.e. 93%) denote a prophetic word of God, permit the conclusion that this phrase virtually represents a technical term for the prophetic revelation of the word (O. Grether, Name und Wort Gottes im Alten Testament, BZAW 64, 1934, 77, cf. 63 ff.). In addition, dāḇār already served early on to designate the divine → commandment and will for justice (Exod. 34:28, the Ten Commandments) granted to Israel along with their → election and the → covenant, and, particularly in exilic and post-exilic times, to act as a periphrasis for the creatively efficacious activity of God in → creation (Gen. 1) and nature (Pss. 29 and 33). The prophetic word of promise which shapes history, the directive word of the covenant which takes possession of men and the creative word of God which determines nature and its order combine to describe the → revelation of God in the OT.

2. Ancient Oriental Notion of the Word of God. In the ancient Orient a word was widely regarded not as an indicative designation, i.e. as a bearer and mediator of meaningful content (the noetic aspect of the word), but as a power which was efficacious in incantations and magical spells, in blessings and curses, even in the spatial and material world. A → curse, as a baneful word, could penetrate the affected person like some disintegrating substance and bring destruction by spreading outwards from within (the dynamic aspect of the word).

The divine word, in particular, was believed to possess dynamic power and creative potency in Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia. In Egypt the power of creation and the preservation of the world is traced back to the divine word. According to an inscription from Memphis, Ptah, the creator god, exercised his creative activity with the help of "heart and tongue", i.e. with his word (L. Dürr, Die Wertung des göttlichen Wortes im Alten Testament und im antiken Orient, Mitteilungen der Vorderasiatisch – (Ägyptisch)en Gesellschaft, 42, 1, 1938, 25). The dynamic power of the creative word is also conveyed from Ptah to other gods. Thus it is said of Thoth: "What rises up out of his mouth takes place, and what he says happens" (ibid., 27 f.). In Mesopotamia, too, the creative power of the divine word is praised. The following predications may be quoted from the Marduk-Ellil hymns: "His word, which passes by like a storm. . . . The word which rends the heavens above; the word which shakes the earth below. . . . His word is a storm which annihilates everything. . . . When his word proceeds gently along, it destroys the land" (8 ff.). As far as the difference between the biblical and the ancient oriental understanding of the word of God is concerned, one can assert, despite many analogies, that in the latter the divinity "is set in a partly magical and partly natural relation to the world" and that in consequence "the word is also viewed as a magical or natural quantity or as an emanation of the divinity, so that the divinity is linked to or identified with nature" (O. Grether, op. cit., 144). In Israel, by contrast, the creative word of God was purified of any magical or emanative understanding, and demythologized to become the word of the God who by exhortation, claim and promise gives shape to history. The OT knows only the particular and at any given time underived creative word of God spoken to the world.

3. The Forms of the Prophetic Proclamation of the Word of God. The subject-matter of prophetic → proclamation is the word of God. However, in so far as the words of the OT prophets display certain basic common forms, despite their individual differences, one must ask what understanding of the word of God the various forms and literary categories of prophetic proclamation express, since it is not the prophet who avails himself of the word, but Yahweh's word which takes the prophet into its service. Here the question of form-criticism passes immediately into that of content: "What determined the choice of the form was primarily the subject-matter of the message" (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 39).

(a) The word of God as a word of vocation (the literary category of the account of a call). The special nature of prophetic proclamation finds expression in accounts of calls where the authority of the prophetic word is grounded solely in the word of God which gives the commission, i.e. in the call. Two forms of the accounts of calls can be distinguished: the first form (Jer. 1:4–10) is characterized by a divine discourse (a word of election and appointment), by the prophetic contradiction and the confirmation of the sending by a concluding sign (here the touching of the mouth, "Behold, I have put my words in your mouth", Jer. 1:9). This form of call-account, characterized by the word of God addressed and transmitted to the prophet, is distinguished particularly by the "very personal individual encounter between Yahweh and the one called" and "the strict subordination of every other consideration to the word of Yahweh" (W. Zimmerli, Ezechiel, BKAT XIII/1, 1969, 17 f.). The second form begins with a vision, where the word issued to the prophet does not go forth in the context of a personal dialogue with the prophet, but is pictured as the result of a consultation of Yahweh with his council which the prophet sees in a vision (Isa. 6; Ezek. 1). But in that the word of vocation comes from the sphere of the divine council, i.e. in that the prophetic word of commission is crystallized out of the vision of the throne-scene, the second form of call-account also clearly exhibits the subordination of the visionary element to the word of vocation: the vision reaches its climax in the audition, in the promulgation of the word of God (W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 19 f.). The concentration on the word of Yahweh which calls the prophet, the account of the call as the prophet's own "press report", to which there are no adequate parallels in the ancient Orient, the fact that the prophetic subject "is knowingly, consciously and willingly addressed, and won over to obedience" (H. W. Wolff, Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament, ThB 22, 1964, 215), the observation that "the waking consciousness was greatly intensified but in no way switched off" (ibid.), that the prophet thus knew "that he had been really called and not intoxicated" (op. cit., 216), and, finally, the surprising fact that the prophets from Amos onwards do not understand themselves as bearers of the Spirit, but as proclaimers of the word of Yahweh – all this shows the difference between the prophetic reception of the word and an ecstatic experience, which by-passes the consciousness. In other words, the various forms of call-accounts make it clear that "the supremacy of the word is the essential distinguishing feature of the Old Testament prophet" (ibid.; cf. Grether, op. cit., 84 ff.).

(b) The word of God as the word of a messenger (the messenger formula). One of the most striking marks of the prophetic proclamation of the word is the introductory formula, "Thus says Yahweh", which represents something of a constant within the literary categories utilized by the prophets, from Elisha to Malachi. This formula originates in the formal language of the secular sending of messengers. It presupposes the situation of a messenger who comes with a message he has received previously, and who, in delivering his message, refers back to this occasion (cf. Gen. 32:4–6; 2 Ki. 18:19, 29, 31). Since, at the point of time of delivering the message, the messenger refers back to the occasion, now in the past, when the employer entrusted him with the message, one should translate "thus has Yahweh spoken". ([Ed.] But because this word has a continuing validity representing the mind and will of the master the emphatic present, "Thus says Yahweh", is equally correct. The Hebrew mind probably did not draw a sharp distinction between past and present in this respect.) The adoption of the messenger formula to introduce the prophetic word indicates that this is strictly understood as a passing on of the entrusted word of God. The messenger formula turns up as early as the Mari letters of the 18th cent. B.C., which report of prophets who have to deliver a message to the king on behalf of God. But the unqualified announcement of judgment by the prophets from Amos onwards is a contrast to such qualified prophecies of well-being delivered to the king to which one can also add rebuke and intervention against the king (cf. Nathan in 2 Sam. 12:1 ff.; Gad in 2 Sam. 24:11 ff.). The Mari texts have no parallels to these unqualified words of judgment (cf. C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech, 1967).

(c) The word of God as a word of disaster (the structure of the prophetic word of judgment). The word of disaster in the prophets before Amos, almost always directed immediately to an individual (usually the king), presents a two-membered statement:

the prophet names the crime and announces Yahweh's judgment. Between the accusation and the announcement of judgment stands the messenger formula ("therefore thus has Yahweh spoken", 1 Ki. 21:17 ff.; 2 Ki. 1:3 f.). In other words, the prophets made a clear distinction between the initial accusation (the motivation) and the announcement of the judgment (the direct word of God). Strictly speaking, the word of God is only the announcement of judgment. It is characterized as such by the introductory messenger formula: the accusation stands before the actual word of the messenger (cf. C. Westermann, ibid.). The prophetic words of disaster from Amos onwards, directed against Israel or Judah as a whole, frequently display the same two-membered nature – motivation, messenger formula and announcement of judgment (Amos 4:1–3; Isa. 8:5–8). The word of God issued direct to the prophet and characterized as such by him by means of the messenger formula (mainly containing subject-matter of a general sort, e.g. "the end has come", Amos 8:2) is given added precision by the prophet by means of an introductory, explanatory and accusatory word of motivation addressed to the listeners. The accusation which provides the motive for and preface to the word of disaster is thus a piece of prophetic reflection on the basis of the reception of the direct word of God. The prophet is no mere mouthpiece of God, but a responsible translator of the received word of God into the situation of the addressee: "It is hardly possible to overrate the importance of the prophet's share, for without it the word the prophet receives does not reach its goal" (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 73).

(d) The word of God and the word of man (quotations in prophetic oracles). Those to whom the word is addressed are also drawn into the word of God, in that the prophet reproduces moods, sentiments and attitudes of the hearers in quotations of words they have spoken (H. W. Wolff, "Das Zitat im Prophetenspruch", op. cit. 38 ff.). Yahweh's word is then understood as his reply to a statement by the people reproduced in quotation form. Characteristically, however, this is not placed in the messenger's word itself, but in the prophet's grounding of the accusation which precedes the word of God. For the prophetic messenger of the word, God's word and man's word are not interchangeable. Conversely, of course, a messenger word which merely extends the word of God "but fails to produce a confrontation with the hearers is essentially unprophetic" (Wolff, op. cit., 110). It is thus precisely the quotation in the prophetic word which shows that Yahweh's word, promulgated by him directly to the prophet, sets out to engage in complete dialogue with the addressees and can assimilate the word of man. But in that the word of man can thus be taken up into the movement of the word of God, it becomes true that "even the quotation is proclamation" (Wolff, op. cit., 84).

(e) The character of the word of God as event (the word-event formula). The characteristic formula for the prophetic reception of the word runs: wāy 'hî d'ḅar YHWH 'el. . ., lit. "and the word of Yahweh was to. . ." 113 OT passages contain this formula, which turns up in the prophetic histories of the early monarchy (e.g. Samuel, 1 Sam. 15:10; Nathan, 2 Sam. 7:4; Elijah, 1 Ki. 17:2, 8; 18:1), appears in the redactional headings of the prophetic books (Hos. 1:1; Zeph. 1:1), but in Jer. (30 times, in part secondary) and especially in Ezek. (50 times) invades the prophet's own words, and also has a firm place in Hag. (2:10, 20) and Zech. (9 times) (cf. W. Zimmerli, BKAT XIII/1, 89).

This word-event formula is characteristic for the OT conception of the word of God in several respects. (i) Since the basic meaning of the verb hāyâh, “it was”, denotes that something becomes effective, the formula could almost be translated “the word of God became active reality with. . .” (S. Mowinckel, Die Erkenntnis Gottes bei den alttestamentlichen Propheten, 1942, 19, quoted in G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 87, n. 15), or “the word assumed effective shape in” (C. A. Keller, BHHW III 2183). The dynamic, urgently pressing force of the word of God clearly emerges here. (ii) The word-event formula stresses “the eminently historical character of the word of God in partaking of the nature of an event” (W. Zimmerli, BKAT XIII/1, 89). The revelation of the word to the prophet is not a process of one-sided spiritual perception of timeless truth but an event which assails the prophet, even, at times, physically (Isa. 21:1–10; Jer. 4:19–21); here the word of God appears as a virtually objective force with a dynamic impact (O. Grether, op. cit., 150 ff.). (iii) The word-event formula does not speak indeterminately of “a word”, but of “the word of God” becoming an effective event (L. Koehler, Old Testament Theology, 1957, 106). The word which goes forth at any particular time demands to be accepted as the complete word of God. There is no superior concept with which to organize and domesticate the word of God. (iv) The frequent utilization by Jer. and especially Ezek. of the word-event formula is the mark of an “already highly developed knowledge of the ‘word of Yahweh’, almost indeed, of the development in Prophetic circles of a ‘prophetic theology of the word’” (W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 89).

4. The Word of God in Prophetic Proclamation. (a) Prophecy before the writing prophets (Samuel, Elijah, Elisha). As Samuel, to whom “the word of Yahweh” was revealed (1 Sam. 3:7) at a time when “Yahweh’s word had become rare in the land” (1 Sam. 3:1), announced judgment on Saul on account of his “rejection of the word of God” (1 Sam. 15:23, 26), so → Elijah invoked the validity of the word of Yahweh with absolute authority against King Ahab, basing himself on the covenant-traditions of the “God of Israel” (1 Ki. 17:1) and the “God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob” (1 Ki. 18:36). He announced to Ahab that neither dew nor rain would fall “except by my word” (1 Ki. 17:1). In consequence of the efficacious power of his mighty word, Elijah was for Ahab the “destroyer of Israel”, because he had not only prophesied the drought, but also caused it by his word (1 Ki. 18:17). In view of the threat of confusion between Yahweh and Baal as a result of Ahab’s syncretistic religious policies, Elijah, as God’s spokesman in Israel on Mount Carmel, brought about a fundamental divorce between Yahweh and Baal on the basis of divine judgment, in order to prove that Yahweh was God and that Elijah had “done all these things at thy word” (1 Ki. 18:36). Thus, thanks to the preaching of Elijah all areas of life, whether in respect of property (the story of Naboth, 1 Ki. 21) or health (Ahaziah’s search for healing, 2 Ki. 1) were subordinated to Yahweh’s lordship, and transgression of the divine law was requited with a word of judgment to the individual (1 Ki. 21:17–19; 2 Ki. 1:3 f.; cf. C. Westermann, op. cit.). Elijah’s journey to Horeb, which links up with Israel’s → wilderness tradition, showed with regard to → revelation, that Yahweh does not reveal himself in storm, earthquake and fire, but in quietly whispered words (1 Ki. 19:12). As with Elijah, so with Elisha, prophetic word and action are closely interwoven. Nowhere in the OT are so many miracles crowded into so small a space and recounted as proof of the prophet’s charisma as here (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 27). By contrast with the prophets from Amos to Jeremiah, Elijah and Elisha are bearers of the Spirit at the same time as they are proclaimers of the word of God –

Yahweh's word and Yahweh's spirit are here closely interconnected. The power of the prophetic word in the political sphere is shown not least by Elisha's designation of Jehu (2 Ki. 9).

(b) The conception of the word of God in the writing prophets. (i) Amos. "The words of Amos of Tekoa" (Amos 1:1): so runs the heading to an older selection of Amos' words from chs. 3–5, which has not yet been given the heading "word of Yahweh", as those who later pass on the words of the prophets like to do (cf. Hos. 1:1; Jer. 1:1). The connexion of the heading "the words of Amos" with the form of the collection of the wise men (cf. the "words of the wise" in Prov. 22:17) indicates, conversely, that at the time of the recording of the sayings of Amos there is still no tradition of literary collections of words of the prophets (H. W. Wolff, Dodeka-propheton, BKAT XIV/1, 1965², 153).

The rhetorical question, "If the lion has roared, who is not afraid? If Yahweh has spoken, who can but proclaim it?" (Amos 3:8) presents a word in the form of a discussion, giving a reply to the question of the legitimacy of speaking in the name of Yahweh: Yahweh's word has startled and caught the prophet by surprise. Anyone who attributes his appearance to brazen caprice must ask himself whether terror at the sudden roaring of a lion is capricious. The inseparable connexion between cause and effect makes it clear: Yahweh's word has irresistibly compelled the prophet to engage in proclamation. His proclamation is a reflex action in response to the word of Yahweh, as is terror to a lion's roar.

In the cycle of visions (Amos 7:1–8; 8:1–2; 9:1–4; cf. 8:2 "the end has come upon my people"), Amos explains how Yahweh forced on him the word concerning the imminent end. Amos distinguishes himself from all previous prophets by preaching total destruction, not just for a single individual (e.g. the king by Nathan in 2 Sam. 7 and 12 and Gad in 2 Sam. 24 and 1 Chr. 21) but for the whole of Israel. Since in Amos' time under Jeroboam II (787–747 B.C.) Israel was enjoying a period of booming economic prosperity, the proclamation of disaster cannot be viewed as the consequence of rational calculation and political far-sightedness. Its sole source is the event of Yahweh's word itself, Yahweh's firm grip, which took Amos from herding the flocks and compelled him to speak (Amos 7:15).

From this one can understand the frequent appearance of the messenger-formula ("Thus says Yahweh", 11 times; Amos 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 6; 3:12; 5:3 f.) and the concluding formula ("Yahweh says", Amos 1:5, 8, 14; 2:3, 11, 16; 3:15; 4:3, 5 f., 8–11; 5:17; 7:3; 9:15). The advice of the high priest Amaziah to his king – "the land is no longer able to bear all his words" (Amos 7:10) – is also explicable from Amos' announcement of total judgment. The word of Yahweh, proclaimed by Amos, has reached dangerous proportions for Israel's religious, political and economic life. Amos is banished from the land: "You must not preach any longer" (Amos 7:13). A thoughtless people, especially its upper classes, self-confident in their own prosperity, have not listened to his word.

Amos therefore preached that a hunger for the word of God would so overwhelm them that they would stagger around exhausted in the search for the word of Yahweh (Amos 8:11 f.). Yahweh can hold back his word; he retains the right of disposal over his word. The longing to hear Yahweh's words is not here a sign of religious life but a hunger which results in death. If Yahweh has withdrawn his word, on which Israel's whole existence is based, that is the ultimate catastrophe (cf. G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 92; for a different view see Wolff, BKAT, XIV, 379 f., who holds that the saying belongs to a later time reflecting Deuteronomic preaching).

(ii) Hosea. The heading "the word of Yahweh that came to Hosea" (Hos. 1:1; cf. Joel 1:1; Mic. 1:1; Zeph. 1:1; Jer. 1:1 LXX) comes from a collector of prophetic tradition from Deuteronomistic circles in Judea.

Since Hosea's commissioning as messenger includes not only his word, but also his marriage and family life, this title makes it clear that "Yahweh's word" does not exclusively denote the word of God to be proclaimed by the prophet (Hos. 2:18, 23 f.; 4:1 etc.), but also the life of the prophet expropriated by the word of Yahweh. "Thus the book of Hosea does not even present the narratives of the prophet (1:2-9; 3:1-5) out of biographical interest, but only because they preserve the word of Yahweh" (H. W. Wolff, BKAT XIV, 3). Yahweh's command to Hosea to marry a girl (a "whore") who had fallen prey to Canaanite cultic immoralities, and in this marriage to exemplify the guilt of the Israel of that time, which had itself lapsed into Canaanite fertility rites, is a symbolic action (Hos. 1:2 ff.) with which the prophet is commissioned at the beginning of his prophetic ministry, "for the land commits great harlotry by forsaking Yahweh" (Hos. 1:2b). This symbolic disclosure of the word of God introduces the first period of Yahweh's speaking through Hosea by stating, according to Hos. 1:2a, how Yahweh began to speak through (not to) Hosea, and is to be understood as a kind of foreword. This first period of the promulgation of Yahweh's word is directed towards a second; Hos. 3 reports another symbolic action, whereby Hosea rescues his wife from slavery and takes firm protective measures to prevent her giving way to her inclinations (Hos. 3:1-5). That is to say, although Israel has turned away from Yahweh and been justly repudiated by him, she will be accepted back again, because Yahweh loves her. The two symbolic actions together thus sound out the centre of Hosea's proclamation. In that the prophet himself presents the word of Yahweh in his own life, and not merely proclaims the word of God by mouth but by his whole family life, Hosea himself comes entirely under the word of God. "This vivid symbolic demonstration of the word of God in the prophet's family . . . announces the message of the incarnation of the word" (H. W. Wolff, op. cit., 24).

In the second part (chs. 4-14), introduced by the attention-catching formula, "Hear the word of the LORD, O people of Israel" (4:1; "word of God" only occurs in Hosea at 1:4 and 4:1) "the whole path of Hosea's proclamation from the threats of judgment to announcement of salvation is . . . now trodden a second time" (Wolff, op. cit., 83).

This ultimate correlation of word of judgment and word of salvation in Hosea is confirmed finally by Hos. 6:5: "Therefore I have hewn them by the prophets, I have slain them by the words of my mouth, and my judgment goes forth as the light." "Prophets" and "words of my mouth" here stand in parallel, i.e. the prophets are messengers of Yahweh, in so far as they proclaim the words of the mouth of Yahweh. The goal of Yahweh's word of judgment is the restoration of a new order of life (Hos. 6:5b); the word that slays is in the service of the word which saves. The teleological correlation of God's word of judgment with his word of salvation is particularly clear in Hosea.

(iii) Isaiah. If the heading of Isa. 1:1 describes the content of the whole book of Isaiah as a "vision" (hāzôn) of the prophet, the content of the selection which originally began at Isa. 2:1 is characterized as “the word” which the prophet “saw”. The visionary experience of the reception of the word is expressed here, just as is the central position of the word as being the content of the prophetic vision.

The corresponding absolute use of “word” is found in Isa. 9:7 (EVV 9:8): “The LORD has sent a word against Jacob, and it will light upon Israel.” This verse not only speaks of the “word” in the absolute as of an almost independent entity, but it also gives us no information as to the content to which people should listen. What is under discussion here is not a word as the bearer of a message, but the word as a bearer of divine and powerful consequences, which creates history. According to Grether, the word is here “rather like an accumulation of latent energies which cannot wait to be released very much longer. . . . The dābār is like a missile with a time-fuse which has just hit the enemy lines and must explode in the next few seconds” (op. cit., 104). This word of Yahweh bound to the prophet (the word is “sent”) is the power which sets history in motion and causes all kinds of destruction, which judges the disobedient nation in a cumulative series of acts of divine punishment (Isa. 9:7–20; 5:25–30). Isaiah looks back to an epoch when Yahweh intervened in Israel’s history with ever new blows, and understands these judgments as the ever new discharges of the word of God sent, proclaimed and dismissed.

This is how the word concerning hardening of the heart in Isa. 6:9 f. should be understood. Isaiah is commissioned to make the nation obdurate and to harden its heart by means of this very word of God, “until cities lie waste without inhabitant, and houses without men, and the land is utterly desolate” (Isa. 6:9–11). In the word concerning hardening of the heart, the conception of the creative word of God at work in history is given its sharpest definition, namely that “this word effects judgment not only in the external world of history, but in human beings, in the most hidden recesses of their own hearts, namely, their refusal of the appeal by which Yahweh would save them” (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 154; cf. Isa. 9:7). The hardening of Israel’s heart to Yahweh’s solicitous offer and the word about obduracy which forms the subject-matter of the prophetic commission – these are the things which constitute the puzzle of Isaiah’s proclamation.

The word of God to be proclaimed by Isaiah is thereby independent of its rejection by men. “The fact that a prophet’s word is not heard is far from meaning that this is the end of it” (G. von Rad, op. cit., 155). The repudiation of the word by Isaiah’s generation means that it must be recorded for a future one: “And now go, write it before them on a tablet, and inscribe it in a book, that it may be for the time to come as a witness for ever. . . . Because you despise this word” (Isa. 30:8, 12; cf. 8:16 ff.). This process of the documentary recording of the message rejected by those who heard it shows not only that, despite its lack of success, the word of God is far from finished. It also, and for the first time, shows the character of the written word, where the prophet extends the area of reference of the word of God beyond the first circle of recipients to hearers further off. The word of God still has a future beyond its rejection, for “he does not call back his words” (Isa. 31:2; 55:11).

This future is depicted in Isa. 2:2–5 (cf. Mic. 4:1–3). Here is the account of a pilgrimage of the nations to the mountain of God, one nation urging another: “Come, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD. . . . For out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem” (→ Wilderness, Mountain, art. oros). The hope is directed to the new order of life established by Yahweh, in the centre of which stands the word of God, signifying righteousness and life and embracing directions for living. The close relationship of the word of God to instruction and law (see below, 5) is shown not only in the designation of the word of God as Torah (Isa. 2:3) but also in the prophet's words which are spoken in the style of priestly Torah.

(iv) Jeremiah. The heading of the book as a whole "words of Jeremiah" (not as W. Rudolf would have it: "the story of Jeremiah", Jeremia, HAT 12, 1968³, 1), and the statistical observation that the term "word of Yahweh" appears 52 times in Jer. out of a total of 241 occurrences in the OT, and that the word-event formula appears 30 times out of a total of a 113 occurrences in the OT (Grether, op. cit., 65 ff.) makes it quite obvious that we are already here in a world of reflective knowledge of the "word of Yahweh", which entitles us to speak in Jer. of a "theology of the word". This view still stands, even discounting the suggested Deuteronomic revisions and additions (e.g. Jer. 11:1 ff.; 46:1; 47:1; 49:34).

The word of God came to Jeremiah as a powerful word of vocation (627 B.C.). The calling of Jeremiah (Jer. 1:4–10) is characterized by the introductory word-event formula as being entirely word-event. Yahweh's word of election and commission (Jer. 1:5) dominates the whole process; the touching of his lips by Yahweh's hand seems to be the sole visionary trait (Jer. 1:9a). The word of appointment to be "a prophet to the nations" is followed by the prophet's interruption (Jer. 1:6). The exhortation to be fearless (Jer. 1:8) makes it clear that the real cause of the prophet's interruption is not his youthful age but his fear of the office of messenger of the word; Jeremiah is well aware of their sufferings from the past history of prophecy. By contrast with the voluntary application of Isa. 6:8b we see here already a knowledge of the burden of proclaiming the word of Yahweh. The process of sending consists, in the case of Jeremiah, in the transference of the word of God: "Behold, I have put my words in your mouth" (Jer. 1:9). The transmission of the word of God to the prophet does not signify for Jeremiah that he has any rights over the word, but it includes the knowledge of Yahweh's freedom to keep him waiting for the event of the word of God. It is through the transmission of the word of God to Jeremiah that he becomes an agent of the word who has been set "over nations and over kingdoms"; as an individual he has been given the power to intervene in the fortunes of nations and kings. These are not the reflections of a megalomaniac which "would make the weal and woe of whole nations dependent on the word of a young man from a petty state" (expressly rejected by W. Rudolf, Jeremia, 6). Here, rather, is revealed the mightiness of the word of God, which is not thrown into history without effect (cf. Isa. 9:7). The prophet's mandate of the word is negative and positive: "to pluck up and break down, to destroy and to overthrow, to build and to plant" (Jer. 1:10). Already there begins to emerge here in the call the clear knowledge of the two-sided nature of the word of God as word of judgment (chs. 1–25) and word of salvation (chs. 30–32).

The word of God features prominently in Jeremiah's early preaching (627–622 B.C., the time of Josiah). The theme of the first phase of Jeremiah's preaching is Yahweh's complaint against Israel's faithless back-sliding into the Baal cult (Jer. 2:4:5, cf. Hosea), and the announcement of the dawning of Yahweh's wrath in the shape of the advancing sinister foe from the north (Jer. 4:5–6:30). In response to Jeremiah's proclamation of judgment, by which he placed himself in the succession of his predecessors, his hearers replied in effect: "What the prophets say turns out to be nothing but wind, and the word [of the LORD] is not in them" (5:13). But because the prophet's word is denied as God's word, God turns it to its destructive fulfilment: "behold, I am making my words in your mouth a fire" (5:14). That is the reply of the word of God (dābār) to the practical atheism of men's words of mockery (dābār; 5:14). The prophet's temptation to doubt, which arises in view of the people's ridicule of the message of judgment, issued and issuing, and his question: will the word that I have proclaimed as Yahweh's word also definitely come true? is similarly reflected in the vision of the almond-bough, which follows immediately after the account of the call. This indicates clearly the beginning of the prophet's reflections and doubts concerning the effective fulfilment of Yahweh's word. Yahweh's interpretation of the vision of the almond (Heb. šāqēd) is: "I am watching [šōqēd] over my word to perform it" (Jer. 1:12; note the play on words in which the point of the vision turns on a pun).

The word of God also features in the misunderstanding of the Deuteronomic reform (609–598 B.C., the time of Jehoiakim). Jeremiah was silent in the period following the Josianic reform (622–609 B.C.). He was waiting to see whether the nation was really turning to Yahweh. Jeremiah was neither a critic nor a propagandist of the reform; no word from God reached him during this time. After the death of Josiah, however, and with Jehoiakim's accession to the throne, when it became clear that the Deuteronomic reform had produced no return to Yahweh, but only a false religious confidence, the word of God reached the prophet anew (Jer. 7:1; 26:1). In the famous temple sermon Jeremiah inveighed against the religious confidence of the nation which appeals to the → temple and the divine presence (Jer. 7:4) but has no use for the covenant commandment (Jer. 7:5 ff.). This excessive emphasis on the temple and on confidence in their deliverance is nothing but an impenitent trust in "delusive words" (Jer. 7:4, 8 JB) and will bring in its train the destruction of the temple (Jer. 7:14). In the great liturgy of the day of repentance, which Jeremiah depicts (Jer. 14:1–15:4), and in which there are echoes of conventional songs of repentance sung by the people (Jer. 14:7, 9, 19–22), the reply of Yahweh (Jer. 14:10; 15:1–4) is the announcement of judgment and catastrophe. In Yahweh's word through the prophet, the people's pious impenitence comes to light. A further consequence of the misunderstanding of the Deuteronomic reform was the bragging of the scribes about the word of the covenant commandment, which thus became a dead law: "How can you now say, 'We are wise, and the law of the LORD is with us'? But, behold, the false pen of the scribes has made it a lie. The wise men shall be put to shame, they shall be dismayed and taken; lo, they have rejected the word of the LORD, and what wisdom is in them?" (Jer. 8:8 f.). The invectives against the temple and scribes earned Jeremiah a death-sentence (ch. 26). But he stood by his message and was ready to answer for it with his own life. The word of Yahweh and the messenger of the word cannot be separated. In ch. 26 it is accordingly not the suffering of the prophet, but the passion-story of the word of God that stands at the centre.

The word of God plays an important part in the confessions of Jeremiah. Jeremiah's ministry as a messenger was not exhausted by his preaching of the word of God. Jeremiah's suffering was the suffering of the man who has, in his own person, been hurt himself by Yahweh's word of judgment. We see the prophet sharing suffering under the word of God, shaken to the very depths of his physical being by that judgment which he himself announced (Jer. 4:19–21). In Jeremiah's lament over the sick and dying land (Jer. 8:18–23), we see man under the judgment and onslaught of the word of God. As often as Yahweh's word came to him, he accepted it greedily as if it were his favourite dish: "Thy words were found, and I ate them, and thy words became to me a joy and the delight of my heart" (Jer. 15:16). But this pleasure and happiness at receiving the word was broken by the knowledge of the judgment he must proclaim, which drove him into isolation from human beings (Jer. 15:17; cf. 16:1–9). Jeremiah, the proclaimer of God's word of judgment, who himself suffered as he announced this judgment against his own inward feelings (Jer. 4:19), and who staked everything on restraining the judgment by means of his intercession (Jer. 14:11; 15:1), suffered at the same time under the taunt that the judgment he announced apparently never seemed to come: "Behold, they say to me, 'Where is the word of the LORD? Let it come true!'" (Jer. 17:15). Jer. 19:1–20:6 reports how, after the symbolic action of the smashing of an earthenware flask, Jeremiah was beaten and put in the stocks by Pashhur, the priest and chief officer of the temple, on account of this proclamation of judgment. The confession of Jer. 20:7–9 follows immediately after the passion: "the word of the LORD has meant for me insult" (20:8 JB). The prophet's resolve to proclaim the word of Yahweh no longer (20:9a) came up against the irresistible weight of the word which presses in on him, like some objective force, from within and without. The suppressed word of God burnt like a fire inside him, threatening disintegration, so that it seemed preferable to endure ridicule and maltreatment rather than be consumed by the burning of the word. Because Jeremiah stood on the side of those who have experienced the assault of the word of God, and because, as a messenger of the word of judgment, he was simultaneously drawn into the → suffering of God over his people, it belongs to the event of the word of God that the witness himself is broken. With no other prophet is the extent of the word of judgment entrusted to him, the suffering which he shares under the assault of the word of God, the suffering he feels at the taunt that the word of God has been proclaimed, but apparently not fulfilled, and the knowledge of the impossibility of escape from the commission to preach the word of God so clearly perceptible as in the case of Jeremiah. The story of the scroll in ch. 36, as also the suffering of Jeremiah himself, is intended to be understood as a kind of passion story of the word of God: man wants to burn the word (Jer. 36:23), but Yahweh's word remains in force even more fully than beforehand (Jer. 36:32). The fact that suffering with Jeremiah was an integral component part of the prophetic ministry is expressed at least (in formal respects) in the fact that, by contrast with the prophets before him, one can no longer clearly notice any formal demarcation between accusatory prophetic discourse and God's actual word of judgment (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 69, 193).

The word of God is the criterion of false prophecy at the time of Zedekiah (598–587 B.C.). As the collection of sayings "concerning the prophets" (Jer. 23:9–40) shows, Jeremiah clashed with prophetic circles in Jerusalem which proclaimed after the first deportation of 598 B.C. that the disaster would be averted, and that the deportees would soon return (Jer. 23:16 ff.; 28:2 ff.). In the face of the sanguine words of these dreamers – what has the word of God to do with dreams? (Jer. 23:28) – Jeremiah proclaimed the abiding validity of God's powerful word of judgment: "Is not my word like fire, says the LORD, and like a hammer which breaks the rocks in pieces?" (Jer. 23:29). In his confrontation with the prophets of optimism and Hananiah, who proclaimed deliverance for Jerusalem, Jeremiah sought for the criteria of the true word of God in false prophecy. Anyone who has been present in Yahweh's council will not be able to tell his hearers what they desire (Jer. 23:18, 22).

When the word comes true it will be known whether the prophet has spoken Yahweh's word (Jer. 28:9). How little the prophet himself has these criteria at his disposal is shown in Jer. 28:11. Jeremiah is not able to counter Hananiah's proclamation of deliverance with any word of Yahweh and goes his way in order to wait for the renewed event of the word of God (Jer. 28:12). Yahweh's even more severe word of judgment (Jer. 28:12 ff.) thus links up with the breaking of the yoke and Hananiah's message of optimism. God's word of power does not leave man's negative reply out of account. However much the word of God may be accompanied by such signs, serving as criteria, these are not open to human manipulation, either objective or neutral. "The right to articulate the predicate 'false prophet' with authority is reserved alone for the prophet" who waits in obedience and readiness for the new event of the word of God (cf. G. Quell, Wahre und falsche Propheten, BFChTh 46, 1, 1952, 194).

(v) Ezekiel. The frequent appearance of the messenger formula, the appearance 60 times out of 241 OT occurrences of the phrase "word of Yahweh", the appearance 50 times out of a total of 113 occurrences of the word-event formula, which respectively mark the beginning of new units of speech, and finally the "oracle of God" formula – n'um YHWH "Oracle of Yahweh" or "utterance of Yahweh" – occurring 83 times in Ezek., and the concluding formula of the word of God – "I, Yahweh, have spoken it" – appearing 11 times, all make it obvious that, as with Jeremiah, we are dealing with an "already highly developed knowledge of the 'word of Yahweh'" (W. Zimmerli, Ezechiel, BKAT XIII III, 1969, 89).

Ezekiel was commanded at the outset to eat the scroll of the word of God (Ezek. 2:9–3:3). Ezekiel is called by the God who appears to him in a scene of the heavenly throne, making it clear that the decisive element in the depiction of the throne-vision is the commissioning of the word. The one sent by Yahweh is entrusted with a word, of which the strongly formal character is quite striking: "Thus has the Lord Yahweh spoken" (Ezek. 2:4). The formal wording of the commission (the messenger formula) is intended to make clear that the prophet's charge to proclaim the word does not rest primarily in a message with firmly fixed outlines and content, but in personal adherence to the Sender, who remains Lord of his word. Ezekiel's proclamation of the word of God is to be before everything else the reflex of his reception of that message (W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 73). Ezek. 2:10 pictures the hand of Yahweh stretched out towards the prophet and holding an open scroll, with writing on both sides, intended to display the oppressive surfeit of the word of God. In that the contents of what is written are named as "lamentation and mourning and woe", "the contents of the book are described from the perspective of the effects which the word written in the book and to be proclaimed by the prophet will bring to maturity" (W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 77). The effect of the word of God is powerful and direct. The roll is offered for the prophet to eat, and thus Jeremiah's picture of his ardent devouring of Yahweh's word as it comes to him (Jer. 15:16) is turned into dramatic reality in the experience of the prophet Ezekiel. The eating of the scroll (Jer. 3:2), the absorption of what is eaten into the inner self (Jer. 3:3), makes clear that the prophet becomes totally one with the word of God. This consent to the word of God excludes outbursts such as Jeremiah's, in the same way that Jeremiah's irresistible longing for the word of God (Jer. 15:16) has become "that which Yahweh has strictly ordered and commanded at the hour of his call" (Ezek. 3:1; cf. Zimmerli, op. cit., 78).

Ezekiel's speaking takes place in the knowledge of the absolute transcendence of the divine word. As already in the passion-story of the word of God in book form in Jer. 36, so now in the mention of the scroll in Ezek. the written form of the prophetic word of God is presupposed. In Ezek. 3:4, by way of conclusion, the command is given to "speak with my words to them". This describes Ezekiel's commission as the prophetic proclamation of the word of God, in correspondence with the word-event of Yahweh.

In Ezek. prophetic symbolic actions anticipate in event-form the history announced by the word of God. Symbolic actions are a vital element of the proclamation of the word of God in Ezekiel. In the brick which he besieges, the scanty fare which he eats, the cutting and destruction of his hair (Ezek. 4:1–5:4), but also in his carrying out an exile's baggage (Ezek. 12:1 ff.) and in marking out the two roads (Ezek. 21:23 ff.), Ezekiel is to give an active symbolic representation of the advance of the enemy, announced by the word of God, the beleaguering and reduction of the city, and the deportation of the population. By contrast with the accounts of prophetic actions in earlier prophecy, which follow an exposition and the account of the action with the interpretation (1 Ki. 22:10 f.; 2 Ki. 13:14–19; Jer. 13:1–11; 19; 28 f.), the introduction in Ezekiel is replaced by the divine word of command, and (with the exception of Ezek. 12:1–16 and 24:15–24) the actual performance of the action by the prophet is no longer reported, but simply the word of God which commands the action (cf. Ezek. 3:25–5:4; 12:17–20). This assimilation of the accounts of symbolic actions into the divine word of command in Ezekiel makes it clear, however, that the symbolic actions are absolutely and entirely the word of Yahweh embodied and becoming event, an anticipation in event-form of the history announced by the word of God (cf. W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 104). It is not, however, simply actively but also passively that the prophet, in his own person and fortunes (lying bound, Ezek. 4:4–8; trembling, Ezek. 12:17–20; numb in the face of his wife's death, Ezek. 24:15–24), is a prediction in word-form of coming events. Whereas in Jer. 4:19–21 the prophet's individual suffering and outcry are expressed unmodified, in Ezekiel all suffering is swallowed up into the word of Yahweh and put at the service of the proclamation of the word of God. It is because the word of God proclaimed by the prophet is not powerless, but itself occasions future history, that the prophet is a symbolic proclamation of the word of God, not only with his mouth, but also with his actions and his suffering, for in them the history which has been introduced by the word of God is already taking shape.

A feature of Ezek. is the debates. The fact that in the proclamation of the word of God it is not only a matter of a "majestic monologue by God, but a process of real encounter with the people of the nation of Israel" (W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 55) is shown in Ezek. by the form of discourse in which an answer is given in debate-form to a quotation of the people (Ezek. 12:21 ff.; 26:28). In answer to what the people are saying, that the prophetic word is not fulfilled and that the natural erosive process of time is taking effect on the word of God (Ezek. 12:21 f.), or that the word of God will only affect reality in the far-off future (Ezek. 12:27), Yahweh replies: "But I the LORD will speak the word which I will speak, and it will be performed. It will no longer be delayed, but in your days, O rebellious house, I will speak the word and perform it, says the Lord GOD" (Ezek. 12:25). Yahweh's word is a word which produces history; it is not eroded by time, and there is no possibility of banishing it to the far future. The peculiarity of this form of debate in Ezek. consists in the fact that the quotations of the nation against which the word of Yahweh is directed are also entirely assimilated into the word of God. That is, in the quotations the actual hearer of the word of God has his say, but in the way that the word of God sees him.

The word of God comes as the word to the individual (the prophet as watchman). Ezek. 33:1–9 introduces the third section of the book, in which the word of Yahweh concerning the coming salvation is the central point. The great judgment on the nation has already overtaken them in the final fall of → Jerusalem and the final dissolution of the state of Judah. By contrast with the introductory account of his call in Ezek. 1:1–3:15 and his mission there to the whole nation “whether they listen or not” (Ezek. 2:5), Ezek. 33:1–9 has the force of a second calling of the prophet. The messenger of the word, who had Yahweh’s burning word of judgment to proclaim, becomes after the fall of Jerusalem a watchman and a warner, delivering the word of Yahweh entirely to the individual. If the prophet hears a word from Yahweh’s mouth, he is to warn the individual sinner (Ezek. 33:7). If he neglects to do so, Yahweh will require his blood at the hand of the prophet (Ezek. 33:8). The word of God thus refers the prophet to the individual recipient of the word with a directness unknown in previous prophecy, and assigns the responsibility for each individual life to the prophet – whereby the messenger of the word of God is himself at stake. The directness of the word of God to an individual man has not been articulated in this way before Ezek.

The word of God is also creative in Ezek. In Ezek. 37:1–14 the vision of the raising of the bones of the dead is recounted. Taken to a field of completely dried-out bones, the prophet is given the charge of speaking Yahweh’s word of promise over this field of the dead (Ezek. 37:4–6). At the spoken word of Yahweh the bones come together, and ligaments, flesh and skin grow over them. At a new word of Yahweh the breath of life comes into that which is still lying dead on the ground, so that the dead rise and stand up alive (Ezek. 37:9–10). This vision is God’s reply to the resigned declaration of the nation (Ezek. 37:11, “our bones are dried up”), in which, for its confession of its lostness, Israel is promised new life, resurrection from the graves of the exile and safe conduct home to their own land (Ezek. 37:11–14). The following points should be remembered, with respect to Yahweh’s word. (1) What is here depicted comes astonishingly close to the original creation of man by Yahweh (Gen. 1), but is heightened by the fact that this creation is a new creation out of the bones of the dead, i.e. of men whose history has reached a point of breakdown. Yahweh’s word effects new creation from the dead. (2) If Yahweh, according to Gen. 1, creates by means of the creative word which he himself speaks, so in Ezek. 37:1–14 it is the “word of Yahweh” (37:4) proclaimed by the prophet which becomes the power which creates life from the dead. (3) This creative word of the prophet, however, does not represent a spell or any magical power. It is related to Yahweh’s word of promise, which provides both the basis, the content and the interpretation of the prophetic discourse (Ezek. 37:4–6, 9, 11–14). (4) This creative word of Yahweh, proclaimed by the prophet, is not a magical potency ruling over nature. It is the resurrection of the scattered nation, its being led out of exile and home to its land, and the bestowal of the → Spirit. Yahweh’s creative word is the opening of a new history which does not come about from the nation’s own natural resources: it can only be expressed in the category of new creation from the dead by Yahweh’s creative word of promise (W. Zimmerli, op. cit., 885 ff.; K. Balzer, Ezechiel und Deuterocesaja, BZAW 121, 1971, 101 ff.).

(vi) Deutero-Isaiah. Many modern scholars regard Isa. 40–55 as the work of a prophet writing towards the end of the exile of the Jews in Babylon between approximately 550 and 538 B.C. His prophecy came to be included with that of Isaiah of Jerusalem. The following reconstruction takes account of this historical perspective. At the beginning of the exile there stands Ezekiel's unrelenting word of judgment; at the end we have Deutero-Isaiah's proclamation of the powerfully effective word of God, whose theme is Israel's salvation.

The word of God is the sole abiding reality (Isa. 40:8; 55:11). Isa. 40:1–8 relates the prophet's call. Vv. 1–5 speak of comforting the nation and building a road through the desert. The prophet counters the summons to "proclaim" with the resigned question, "What shall I cry? All flesh is grass . . ." (v. 6). It is the complaint of those who are left in exile, those who have felt the breath of Yahweh's judgment (vv. 6 f.). By contrast with the despair and scepticism of the prophet who stands in solidarity with his people comes the message: "the word of our God remains for ever" (40:8 JB). This word of God is the foundation of all the prophet's proclamation; his whole proclamation is summed up in Isa. 40:8 and 56:6–11 (C. Westermann, Isaiah 40–66, 1969, 8). The subject-matter of this word is that the nation will be forgiven, comforted and led back home along the desert-road. This word of God is not the word which stands dualistically opposed to a world of transience and death, but the word which is spoken into history, bringing about a new history and a new future: as the rain waters the earth and causes the crops to spring up, "so shall my word be that goes forth from my mouth; it shall not return to me empty, but it shall accomplish that which I purpose, and prosper in the thing for which I sent it" (Isa. 55:11). It is this creative power of the word of God in history, which will be realized in the return of the nation from exile, which Deutero-Isaiah proclaims.

The word of God is expressed by the word of the prophet. Isa. 40:8, in connexion with the call of the prophet, spoke of the permanence of the word of God, and Isa. 55:11 spoke equally of the word which changes the world, which effects that "for which I sent it" (O. Grether, op. cit., 134). The word of God powerful in history is the word of God proclaimed by the prophet he has sent. By contrast with the soothsayers and oracle-mongers of Babylon (Isa. 44:25), Yahweh has honoured the word of judgment of Israel's prophets (Isa. 44:26). But if Yahweh has made their word of judgment come true, then he will also make the saving action proclaimed by his prophets come true (Isa. 44:27). The movement in history announced by Deutero-Isaiah is the out-working of a word, which does not return empty (cf. Isa. 45:23).

The word of God is vindicated by world-history. In the face of the world of the Babylonian gods the question must be asked: What is the power which alone is at work in history? Deutero-Isaiah's answer runs: Yahweh alone is the God, whose word of promise creates history. He is the One who surpasses the idols of Babylon in that the events of Israel's history have all been announced and correspondingly taken place. "The reliable connexion between God's speaking and his acting is the decisive argument in the judicial proceedings between Yahweh and the gods" (C. Westermann, op. cit., 16; cf. Isa. 41:26 f.; 43:9 f.; 44:7; 45:21; 48:14). God's power and right of disposal in his word over future history is the real proof that he is God, as against the impotence of the idols (Isa. 44:1).

The word of God is the ground of the creation of the world. Deutero-Isaiah extends the compass of the word of God to a dimension which it had never reached in any prophet before him, namely, to the creation of the world by the word of Yahweh (Isa. 40:26; 58:13; 50:3). The stars, which were regarded in Babylon as the supreme gods, are creations of Yahweh's word. By his word Yahweh has created the world and called the whole host of the stars of heaven into existence (Isa. 40:26). By contrast with the creative power of the word of Marduk, the creative word of Yahweh is here proclaimed as not only causing history, but calling the whole of creation into existence. The proclamation of the creation of the world by the word signifies the extension of the historical efficacy of the word of God into the world of creation, whereby the creation of the world itself becomes an element in Yahweh's saving activity in history.

The word of God is a word of deliverance and salvation. In view of the exile and the persisting Babylonian domination, was it possible to believe the prophet with his proclamation of the word of Yahweh as creating history in its dimensions of creation and in its dimensions of past and future? It is from this angle that one should understand the literary category of the priestly word of deliverance, which the prophet adopts in his proclamation to "those of little faith and those who had grown very weary, for whom reality wore a very different appearance, because they felt themselves forsaken by God and were unable to believe that Jahweh cared about their 'way'" (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 249; cf. Isa. 41:8 ff.; 45:9 ff.; 49:14 ff.; 54:4 ff.). This word of deliverance is for Deutero-Isaiah the most characteristic form of a promise of salvation, utilizing, as it does, the form of favourable hearing by a priest in answer to an individual's complaint (1 Sam. 1; cf. J. Begrich, Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament, ThB 21, 1964, 217 ff.). The word of God which he has to proclaim is directed to every member of this nation as a whole in his most individual and personal self (cf. C. Westermann, op. cit., 12 ff.). The word which embraces the world and history, which Yahweh has put in the prophet's mouth (Isa. 51:16), and which makes his mouth a sharp sword (Isa. 49:2), is at the same time there, "so that I [the prophet] may know how to sustain with a word him that is weary" (Isa. 50:4). The mighty word which calls the world and history into existence is also the word of deliverance and salvation with which God lovingly condescends to his people and woos their heart, so hardened by suffering. "Never before had he [Jahweh] come so close to his people when he addressed them, laying aside anything which might alarm them in case he should terrify one of those who had lost heart" (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 250).

5. The Word of God as Covenant Commandment. (a) "The words" constitute the proclamation of God's will for justice. The commandments, the proclamation of God's will for justice, are called "the ten words" in Exod. 34:28 (cf. Gk. "decalogue"), and described more precisely as "the words of the covenant". It is not they which are the basis of the covenant (cf. O. Procksch TDNT IV 99); it is the → covenant grounded in Yahweh's election which includes the covenant ordinances. The proclamation of God's will for justice is introduced in Exod. 20:1 by "Yahweh spoke all these words". Thus the communication of these commands is founded by the introductory preamble in Exod. 20:2 on the self-disclosure of Yahweh and the leading out of the nation from → Egypt. This is also expressed in the account of the ratification of the covenant attached to the so-called Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:22–23:19). In Exod. 24:3–8 Moses recounted to the people “all the words of Yahweh and all the ordinances”, and the people answered with one voice, “All the words which Yahweh has spoken we will do.” Then Moses wrote down “all the words of Yahweh” (Exod. 24:3 f.).

(b) The Covenant Commandments and the Prophets’ Message of Judgment. The way in which the prophets viewed their commission of validating the authority of the covenant commandment against judicial malpractice and law-breaking in Israel is shown in Amos, who measures Israel by the old covenant regulations. Among the reasons for the word of judgment which he announced, Amos names the oppression of the → poor (Amos 2:7 f.; 3:9 f.) and the perversion of justice as transgression of the covenant order (cf. Exod. 22:30 ff.; 23:1 ff.). In Hosea the consequence of transgressing the covenant law (Hos. 4:2) is that Yahweh gives notice of the abrogation of the covenant: You are “Not-my-people” (Hos. 1:9). And in Jeremiah’s temple speech the people have their sin uncovered in a decalogue-like array of justice (cf. the enumeration of stealing, murdering, committing adultery and perjury, Jer. 7:9), and words of judgment (Jer. 7:1 ff.). Equally, the threat to the nation in the covenant law, if they transgress the commandment, provides the background to the description of → Jerusalem as “the city of blood” (Ezek. 22) and Ezekiel’s announcement of judgment. Thus one sees already quite clearly in the prophetic proclamation the close association of God’s powerful word of judgment, which announces and forms the prelude to coming history, and the judicial proclamation of covenant law which provides the foundation for the word of judgment (R. Bach, Gottesrecht, 23 ff.; W. Zimmerli, The Law and the Prophets: A Study of the Meaning of the Old Testament, 1965).

(c) “The Word” as a Designation of the Whole Commandment. In Deuteronomy not only is the covenant commandment designated as “the ten words” (Deut. 4:13; 10:4), but the multiplicity of commandments are designated as “words” (cf. Deut. 1:1, 18; 4:10, 36; 5:5; 28:14), and an individual commandment as a “word” (Deut. 12:28; 15:15; 24:18, 22). However, in so far as in Deut. “the words of this Torah” (Deut. 17:19; 27:3; 28:58; 29:28), despite the great variety of individual commandments, are understood for the first time as the simple uniform revelation of the will of Yahweh to Israel, “word” also appears in the sing. to denote the whole commandment (Deut. 4:2; cf. Jos. 1:13), and in consequence to express total human dependence on “this word” (cf. this word “is your life”, Deut. 32:47). Every seven years, in the context of the festival of the renewal of the covenant, the divine covenant-law with its promises and threats (cf. the curses in Deut. 27) was read out at the great national assembly, “that they may hear and learn to fear the LORD your God, and be careful to do all the words of this law” (Deut. 31:12). The concentration on the one God (Deut. 6:4), the one sanctuary (Deut. 12) and the one “word” (Deut. 4:2) reveals Deut.’s theological concern. “The whole revelation of the divine will for justice imparted to Israel in the covenant, brought near to it by Yahweh and laid in its heart and mouth (30:14) is thus simply dābār [word]” (W. Zimmerli, RGG ³ VI 1810).

6. The Word of God and History in the Deuteronomistic History. Deuteronomistic history, beginning in Deut. 1–3 with a glance backwards to the time of →

Moses, and then presenting the history of the conquest of the land, the judges and the kings, i.e. comprising the books from Deut. to 2 Ki., is thought by many to-day to have been written in its final form after the catastrophe of 587 B.C. from the theological standpoint of the book of Deut.

(a) The curse of the covenant commandment. Deuteronomistic history presents the history of Israel in both northern and southern kingdoms as a story of progressive apostasy from Yahweh's commandment, especially from the summons of Deut. to worship Yahweh at only one place (Deut. 12). Judgment on Israel and Judah (2 Ki. 17:7 ff., 19 f.) is the consequence of the powerful effect of God's word of justice and of law in Israel's history, and therefore the honouring of the possibility of the curse announced in Deut. (Deut. 27:15 ff.; 28:15). The curse in Deut. was thus no empty word (Deut. 32:47), but became reality in the history of Israel's downfall.

(b) The threat of the prophets. Not only was the curse of the covenant commandment realized in the history of Israel and Judah, but so also was the threat of the prophets. Deuteronomistic history portrayed the course of history it presented, a period of almost 700 years of Israelite history from the time of Moses to the Babylonian exile, in terms of the interconnexion between the promulgation of prophetic threats, and their corresponding historical fulfilment, making use of a fixed terminology. The prophetic word "is confirmed" (Deut. 9:5), "does not fail" (Jos. 21:45; 23:14; 1 Ki. 8:56; 2 Ki. 10:10), "it is established" (1 Sam. 1:23; 15:11, 13; 2 Sam. 7:25; 1 Ki. 2:4; 6:12; 8:20; 12:15), "it comes to pass" (Jos. 23:15), "it is fulfilled" (1 Ki. 2:27; 8:15, 24). "To show how this word functioned in history" (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 94 n. 23) and "the correspondence between promulgated word and historical fulfilment" (op. cit., I, 340) are that which undergirds the concern of Deuteronomistic history (cf. Deut. 18:21 f.).

(c) The summons to return. In teaching, however, that the history of total annihilation should be understood as the fulfilment of Moses' curse and the honouring of the prophetic threat, Deuteronomistic history understood itself at the same time as a call to return (1 Ki. 8:46–53). As again and again after times of apostasy and judgment new deeds of deliverance followed a return to Yahweh (Jdg. 2:11–22; 1 Sam. 12:6–25), so, in view of the totality of the judgment, it remains an open question as to whether "it might not yet come to an entirely new phase with entirely new provisions of salvation for the people who are Yahweh's possession" (H. W. Wolff, op. cit., ThB 22, 314). "The work therefore contributes to an urgent invitation to return to the God who brings salvation in history" (op. cit., 322). But this means, with respect to the word of God proclaimed by the prophet, that the goal of the proclamation of God's word of judgment is not that (as with fortune-telling) it should become history, but that people should return to Yahweh. Hence, the announcement of judgment might not come true (Jer. 25:3 ff.; 26:2 ff.; 36:2 f.; Ezek. 18:1 ff.; 32:1 ff.; Jon. 3:8 ff.), or that, once executed, the judgment might itself become the message as in Deuteronomistic history.

(d) The promise to David. Alongside the fulfilment of the curse and the message of judgment in Israel's history, and this history as itself a summons to return, there is the word of promise. But the significance it deserves is disputed. If we follow G. von Rad, the promise given to → David in 2 Sam. 7 stands as a heading to Israel's history of judgment. The final notice in the Deuteronomistic history of the liberation of king Jehoiachin and his elevation to the table of the king of Babylon (2 Ki. 25:7–30) is also intended to turn people's expectation to the God who has made his promise to David concerning the future of the Son of David, and who keeps faith even in face of judgment (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 343 f.). However, Deuteronomistic history teaches that the history of Israel should be understood as the fulfilment of the covenant commandment proclaimed by Moses with its possibilities of blessing and curse. It honours the threats announced by the prophets and is thus a summons to return to Yahweh. At the same time it brings a reminder of the promise even in face of Israel's history of judgment. Thus both elements of the word of God are bound together here, as indeed they already had been in the pre-exilic prophets (cf. above 5 (b)). "The word of God is here both the permanently present demand of the commandment in the nation and also the continually new proclamation in the prophetic word which affects and shapes history" (Zimmerli, *RGG*³ VI 1810). What Zimmerli says here of the prophetic word is true of the word of promise, the summons to return and the message of judgment.

7. The Word of God as the Word of the Creator. The fact that the OT conception of the creative power of the word of God is influenced by ancient oriental hymns (L. Dürr, op. cit., 8 ff.; cf. above, 2), which praise the thunder and violence of Marduk's voice in the storm, is shown by Ps. 29, which portrays the appearance of Yahweh in the storm (v. 3 ff.) and hears God's booming word of power in the thunder-clap. There is a two-fold distinction between the OT conception and that of the ancient orient, which saw the mighty word of the divinity as a dynamic potency which emanated from the divinity and held sway over nature.

(a) In the OT there is a correlation of the word of the Creator with God's word of salvation (Pss. 33:6, 9; 148:5, 8). Yahweh's word in creation, by which he called heaven into existence (Ps. 33:6, "by the word of Yahweh the heavens were made") is an element of Yahweh's historical lordship in word and deed (Ps. 33:4) and of his covenant-based condescension to the poor (Ps. 33:13 ff.). The protological word of the Creator (Ps. 33:6) has the function of serving the soteriological word of salvation (Ps. 33:4). The determination of this relationship is confirmed by the first creation narrative (ascribed to the priestly tradition) which not only speaks of the word of command of Yahweh the Creator, by whose power all things come into existence (Gen. 1), but also intends creation by the word to be understood as the opening chapter of the history of the covenant. C. Westermann represents a critical approach to Pentateuchal study when he writes: "In the great context of the Priestly Code God's working by the word is in no way limited to the creation; his activity in history is similarly determined", and this (following the Priestly representation) reaches its climax in the establishment of the cult (Exod. 25:1; C. Westermann, Genesis, BKAT, I, 153). In this association of the word of the Creator with the covenant- and salvation-history of Yahweh in his dealings with Israel Gen. 1 corresponds with the proclamation of Isa. 40–55.

(b) There is also a correlation of the word of the Creator with God's word of law (Ps. 147:15 ff.). In Ps. 147:15 ff. the creative word of God is specifically linked with meteorological phenomena; Yahweh's word, sent out like a messenger (Ps. 147:15, "He sends forth his command to the earth, his word runs swiftly"), brings snow (v. 16) and hail (v. 17). Yahweh's word also causes the ice to melt again (v. 18). But this creative word which holds sway over nature is none other than the word of the covenant commandment, by which Yahweh lays claim to Israel: "He declares his word to Jacob, his statutes and ordinances to Israel" (v. 19). Israel consequently does not understand the creative word mythically or naturalistically but in accord "with the word of law and lordship which was imparted to the chosen people. . . . Having had the word of law and lordship imparted to them, the chosen people came to know and understand the God who rules nature by his word, and who bears and sustains all creation" (H.-J. Kraus, Psalmen XV/I, 1972⁴, 958 f.).

Thus in the OT Yahweh's creative word is to be understood only in close connexion with the word of God as the word of salvation (the word of promise) and as the word of law (the covenant commandment). It is this which constitutes the specifically Israelite understanding of the word of God.

8. For the understanding of the word of God in Judaism → rhēma OT 2; for the religious historical background to John's Gospel see also under NT 4 (b).

NT 1. The Occurrence and significance of logos and legō in the NT. (a) logos is attested 331 times in the NT (appearing in all writings except Phlm. and Jude), with both secular and theological meanings. logos means inter alia statement (Matt. 5:37), utterance (Matt. 12:32; 15:12; Lk. 20:20), question (Matt. 21:24), command (Lk. 4:36), report, information and rumour (Acts 11:22; Matt. 28:15; Mk. 1:45; Lk. 5:15), discourse (Matt. 15:12), wording (1 Cor. 15:2), word of mouth (Acts 15:27; 2 Cor. 10:10) as opposed to the written (Acts 1:1) word, mere words by contrast with power and action (1 Thess. 1:5; 1 Cor. 4:19), object, matter (Mk. 9:10; Acts 8:21), words of Scripture (1 Cor. 15:54), words of warning (Heb. 5:11), account (Rom. 14:12), settlement (of an account) (Phil. 4:15), motive (Acts 10:29), proclamation, teaching, instruction (Lk. 4:32; 10:39; Jn. 4:41; 17:20), the word of God, the word of the Lord, the word of promise, of truth, of life, the word of Jesus, the word concerning Jesus Christ (Acts passim), Jesus as the Word (Jn. 1:1, 14).

(b) legō, to speak, appears 1320 times in the NT, mostly unstressed, but sometimes used with the theological, qualified significance discussed below (cf. the → Amen-words under 2 (a) (iii), and Jesus' words of healing 2 (a) (iv)). The vb. laleō, to speak, which belongs to another stem and is less important, however (298 instances), is used primarily by Luke (Gospel and Acts 91 times), John and Paul (60 times each, including 34 times in 2 Cor.). logikos, reasonable, is found only in Rom. 12:1 and 1 Pet. 2:2; logios, scholarly, educated, only in Acts 18:24. The diminutive logion (formed from logos), saying (originally a short word, oracle), is attested only 4 times in the NT (Acts 7:38; Rom. 3:2; Heb. 5:12; 1 Pet. 4:11), always of some form of divine inspiration.

2. The Word of Jesus Christ: Jesus' own words. (a) The proclamation of Jesus. At the centre of Jesus' words stands the → proclamation of God's pressing nearness and the announcement of the inauguration of God's world-wide dominion (→ Kingdom), already present in Jesus' person and words. Jesus' words therefore announce neither simply the presence, nor exclusively the future of the kingdom of God. Rather, Jesus spoke of a present coming of the future kingdom of God which was already taking place in his words. But in Jesus' proclamation one finds no absolute use of "the word of God". Mk. 4:13–20, the sole place where this term is encountered in the mouth of Jesus, is regarded by J. Jeremias and others as belonging to the early church's interpretation of the parables (Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 1963², 77 (but → Parable, art. parabolē NT 3).

(i) The lack of messenger and word-event formulae. Nowhere did Jesus follow the OT prophets in prefacing his words with the messenger formula “thus says the Lord”; and, in the context of his proclamation, the word-event formula “the word of God came to me” is similarly lacking. This OT formula occurs once only in Lk. 3:2 (rhēma theou egeneto, “the word of God came to John”) in the case of John the Baptist, who is however placed in the time of the OT prophets (Lk. 16:16). It is lacking similarly in apostolic times. The lack of messenger and word-event formulae in the case of Jesus is an indication that Jesus’ proclamation cannot be understood simply in prophetic categories.

“There can be only one reason why the idea of a detailed Word of God imparted to Jesus Himself has not found its way into the [Synoptic] record. This is that such an idea was felt to be inappropriate and inadequate to describe the relationship of Jesus with God” (G. Kittel, TDNT IV 114). The saying of Jesus that the Father had delivered everything to him (Matt. 11:27) “set the unity of Jesus with the Father and also with the Word of God, on a completely different basis far beyond isolated impartation” (ibid.).

(ii) The antitheses and the Amen-formulae. There is a positive correspondence with this lack of messenger and word-event formulae in the proclamation of Jesus in the presence of introductory formulae, which show that the claim of Jesus breaks the bounds of that of an OT prophet of the word. In the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount with the schematized, “You have heard that it was said to the men of old . . . but I say to you” (Matt. 5:21 ff.), Jesus annuls the statements of the past which were regarded as having divine authority, setting his own “I” in the place where, in the prophets, we find Yahweh’s.

In this, Jesus is not claiming, as the OT prophets and the rabbis did, to be the legitimate interpreter of the → law of God. He is instead setting himself up over against the Torah. While in the Qumran community “the radicalized demand of the divine commandment is nowhere set over against the Torah of Moses” (E. Lohse, “Ich aber sage euch”, in E. Lohse, ed., Der Ruf Jesu und die Antwort der Gemeinde. Exegetische Untersuchungen Joachim Jeremias zum 70. Geburtstag, 1970, 189–203, see p. 197), Jesus is speaking in the antitheses as once the God of Moses did, and thus setting himself and his words up directly alongside God and the word of God. The same is true of the formula, “Amen, I say to you” (cf. Mk. 3:28; 8:12; 9:1, 41; 10:15, 29; 11:23; 12:43; 13:30; 14:18–25, 30 and par.), which has no analogy in the whole of the Jewish literature (→ Amen). The Amen-formula normally served to strengthen someone else’s words, and was used in OT times to adopt words of blessing or cursing (G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, 1902, 226–29), but Jesus used it without exception in order to preface and strengthen his own words. As such, however, it is not to be compared with the messenger-formula used by prophets (J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I, 35 f.). Rather, the placing of the Amen in front of Jesus’ own words characterizes them as something sure and trustworthy. “Thus in the amēn preceding the legō hymin of Jesus we have the whole of Christology in nuce” (H. Schlier, amēn TDNT I 338). The Amen-formula which prefaces Jesus’ words is an expression of Jesus’ divine certainty of himself and the divine self-authentication of his own words.

(iii) The authority of Jesus’ words. His use of the Amen-formula and “I” shows that Jesus intended his word to take the place of the Torah. It was stated in contemporary Judaism that the man who hears the words of the Torah and does good works is building on firm ground. We find Jesus saying “he who hears these words of mine and does them will be like a wise man who built his house upon the rock” (Matt. 7:24; cf. Deut. 28:15, 30). The “I” of Jesus which speaks here is claiming divine authority. “What distinguishes his word even from the highest claims of the prophets of old is the fact that Jesus makes people’s decision dependent on the hearing and doing of his own words. The OT prophets know that they are the bearers of the word of God – nothing less. But none of them says that ‘his words’ do not pass away or that it is by his words that the fate of his hearers will be decided. But, according to all the traditions, this is precisely what Jesus says” (J. Schniewind, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, NTD 2, 1968¹², 105; cf. Mk. 8:38; 13:31).

The authority of Jesus’ word is seen in his call to → discipleship: “and he said to him, ‘Follow me’” (Mk. 2:14; cf. 1:14 ff.). This call of Jesus, which confronts men in the midst of their everyday work, is not bound to any pre-conditions. It comes about through the efficacious word of Jesus, which makes men’s response appear as something quite self-evident. The power of this word is further reflected in the response of the hearers. They either took offence at Jesus’ words (Mk. 10:22; Matt. 15:12) or were amazed at his words, “for he taught as one who had authority, and not as their scribes” (Matt. 7:29). Alternatively, they attempted “to entrap him in his talk [logō]” (Mk. 12:13 par. Matt. 22:15, Lk. 20:20), because it is in his words that his claim and the centre of his mission can be seen.

(iv) The unity of Jesus’ words and deeds. The power of Jesus’ word is also shown not least in the stories of → healing, where the healings ensue (Mk. 1:25 f.; Lk. 7:14 f.) through the word of Jesus (Mk. 2:11, “I say to you, rise . . .”), and through his word of command (Mk. 9:25). The connexion between Jesus’ word of forgiveness (Mk. 2:5) and his word of healing (Mk. 2:11) is to be noted: the word of healing is the physical expression of Jesus’ word of forgiveness. The word of the Judge of the world, who has the power to forgive sins, is proved in the healing to be an effective and a creative word.

The healings are part of Jesus’ word and are not to be detached from his proclamation. According to Lk. 4:18, Jesus related the prophetic word of Isa. 61:1 f. to his own mission. God had sent him to bring good news to the poor and sight to the blind. This denotes the unity of word and deed in Jesus’ proclamation. But it is not only the unity of word and deed, but the superiority of word over deed which is characteristic for Jesus’ proclamation. Mk. 1:21–38 recounts the various healings performed by Jesus and finally his “flight” (Mk. 1:35 ff.) where he gives the disciples who are looking for him the reply: “Let us go elsewhere . . . so that I can preach there, too, because that is why I came” (Mk. 1:38 JB). It becomes obvious that Jesus’ deeds (→ Miracle, art. semeion) are subordinated to his word in those accounts of healings where the healing takes place by means of Jesus’ word – “But only say the word, and my servant will be healed” (Matt. 8:8) – something without parallel in Jesus’ world, and thus striking for the eye-witnesses (cf. also Matt. 8:16: “he cast out the spirits with a word”). The proclamation of the kingdom of God takes place by means of Jesus’ word, and Jesus’ healings are the physical expression of his word.

(b) Jesus’ Unconcealed Word of Suffering and of the Cross: Mark’s Gospel. Mk. 1:45 (“he [the healed man] went about and began to talk about it and to spread the news [ton logon] . . .”) and the phrase “he [Jesus] spoke the word to them”, which appears in Mk. 4:33, cf. 2:2 and 8:32, belong entirely to the Marcan redaction (E. Schweizer, Neotestamentica. Deutsche und englische Aufsätze, 1951–1963, 1963, 100; J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 1963², 77). They are therefore to be interpreted in the context of Mk.'s theology. According to Mk., Jesus forbade those who had been healed to say anything further about the miracle of their healing (Mk. 1:44; 5:43; 7:36); people must not get to know that Jesus is the messiah by hearing tales of miracles (→ Secret). But it is stressed at the same time that Jesus' commands to keep silence were broken again and again (Mk. 1:45; 7:36). Mk. recounts this breaking of the command to keep silence because Jesus' divine authority cannot remain hidden, but he stresses the secrecy because it is not yet time for the proclamation of Jesus: his mystery is not yet revealed in his → miracles; it is first truly revealed at the → cross (cf. E. Schweizer, The Good News According to Mark, 1970, 30 f.). The real centre of the story of Jesus is not to be found in the miracles, but in his suffering and death.

In the first part of Mk.'s Gospel, the collection of conflict-debates (Mk. 2:1–3:6), which recount Jesus' victory over sin and law, the hardening of the → Pharisees' hearts and their decision to put Jesus to death, is introduced with the sentence "and he [Jesus] was preaching the word to them" (Mk. 2:2). The Pharisees' response to the "speaking of the word [elalei ton logon]", which proves the power of Jesus over sin and the law, was blindness to God's revelation in his word. In the second part (Mk. 3:7–6:6) Jesus replied to the hardness of heart of his relations ("he is beside himself [exestē]", Mk. 3:21) and to his rejection by the → scribes from Jerusalem ("he is possessed by Beelzebul", v. 22) by speaking in → parables (v. 23). Mk. 4:33 f. establishes the necessity of parabolic language in retrospect: "With many such parables he spoke the word to them, as they were able to hear it; he did not speak to them without a parable, but privately to his own disciples he explained everything". God's revelation in Jesus' word is so foreign to men that all Jesus' speaking can be done only in pictorial language. Only God himself can open up such pictorial language for men.

By contrast with Jesus' concealing teaching in parables, Mk. 8:32 speaks of the direct unconcealed speaking of Jesus: "and he said this plainly." The content of this direct word of Jesus is the suffering and death of the Son of man (8:31). The word of the → cross is the dissolution of all pictorial speech: "The mystery which has previously been hidden and is now unconcealed is the suffering of the Son of Man" (E. Schweizer, op. cit., 100). For Jesus' word of power over demons, sin and the law remains a concealed word so long as it is not understood in the light of Jesus' unconcealed word concerning his suffering and death. In understanding the word of God, there is thus mirrored the thought that Mk. wished his gospel to be understood as a passion story with extended introduction (M. Kähler). In that Jesus' words and deeds, together with his death and resurrection, are thus proclaimed by Mk. as the word of God, the transition to the "word of the cross and resurrection" as the decisive subject-matter of NT proclamation becomes readily intelligible.

(c) The Messiah of the Word and the Messiah of Deed: Matthew's Gospel. Matthew not only presents the words of Jesus in large blocks of discourses (the Sermon on the Mount in chs. 5–7, the sending out of the Twelve in ch. 10, discourses against the Pharisees in chs. 12 and 23, parables in ch. 13, behaviour in the Christian community in ch. 18, and the apocalyptic discourse in ch. 24), but also gives expression to his understanding of the word of Jesus by the way, in particular, in which he has related the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5–7) to the collection of ten narratives of miracles of Jesus (chs. 8 f.): the Sermon on the Mount (the word of the messiah) is followed by the deeds of Jesus (the → work of the messiah). Matt. has expressed this basic thought not only by his compositorial placing of the Sermon on the Mount before the miracle narratives, but also by the redactional sentences Matt. 4:23 and 9:35 which act as a surrounding frame for chs. 5–9: Jesus “proclaimed the gospel of the kingdom and healed every kind of sickness . . . among the people” (Matt. 4:23; 9:25). “The basic aspects of Jesus’ working are here described: He is a preacher, the messiah of the word . . . and, in healing, the messiah of the act” (J. Schniewind, op. cit., 8). Finally, chs. 5–9 are summarized and pointed in the words of Jesus, quoted deliberately at the end by Matt: the blind see, the lame walk, lepers are cleansed and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up and the poor have the good news proclaimed to them (Matt. 11:5).

In this Jesus-logion, the word concerning the good news preached to the poor, which stands at the end as a climax to the list of miracles enumerated, is transparently the central point; from this it is evident “that the good news is to be more than all miracles” (Schniewind, op. cit., 140). The importance of the placing of this word of Jesus at the end and as a climax to the enumeration is characteristic of Matt., although it seemed odd even to the earliest exegetes. Some MSS have moved the word about the resurrection of the dead to the end of Jesus’ words or left the word about the good news out entirely, because the resurrection of the dead seemed to them to be something far greater than the word of Jesus. For Matt. (and for Jesus) the case is exactly the reverse: the word of Jesus is the centre, the healings performed by Jesus’ word (Matt. 8:8, 16) are an accompaniment in the form of signs to the word of Jesus. They are a physical expression of his mightily creative word (G. Eichholz, Tradition und Interpretation, ThB 29, 1965, 39–43).

3. The Word Concerning Jesus Christ: the Cross and Resurrection as the Content of the word of God. (a) The understanding of the word of God in Paul. Paul calls the message proclaimed by him to his congregation “the word of God” (1 Cor. 14:36; 2 Cor. 2:17; 4:2; Phil. 1:14), “the word” (1 Thess. 1:6; Gal. 6:6), “the word of the Lord” (1 Thess. 1:8), or “the word of God which you heard from us” (1 Thess. 2:13).

(i) The word of tradition. However much Paul was aware that the word of God which he had to proclaim was founded directly on the revelation of the Son of God outside Damascus (Gal. 1:1, 15 f.), and distinguished him from other proclaimers of the word whose legitimation was mediated through men, he stressed just as much, on the other side, that the message proclaimed by himself and the Jerusalem apostles is the same (→ Proclamation). Closely following an old Jerusalem confession, Paul preached the message of the Son of God, who, on the basis of the resurrection, was designated Son of God in all his power (Rom. 1:3 f.).

Paul reminds the spiritual party in Corinth of the message of salvation in accordance with the word (logō, i.e. wording) in which he proclaimed it to them, which he passed on to them in the same terms in which he himself received it (1 Cor. 15:1–3), the content of these traditions from Jerusalem quoted by Paul in the text being the resurrection of the messiah who had died for sins (1 Cor. 15:3–5). The word of God proclaimed by Paul is constitutively related to the cross and resurrection of Jesus as the object of the proclamation; here the remembrance of that which took place then is not simply an appeal to faith in the word of God (as with R. Bultmann, "The Concept of the Word of God in the New Testament", in Faith and Understanding, 1969, 286–312, see especially 300 ff.). The word of God for Paul is the message of a unique event at that time, and as such speaks to people: this is the message "by which you are saved, if you hold it fast – unless you believed in vain" (1 Cor. 15:1 f.).

(ii) The word of the cross. Paul describes the centre of his proclamation as "the word of the cross". He has publicly proclaimed the crucified Christ in the Galatian congregations (Gal. 3:1), and made it the sole content of his preaching (1 Cor. 2:2). In the word of the → cross, Paul puts into words "what took place on the cross. Here a decision about mankind has been given by God. The message depends on what has happened. It proclaims the decision which has already been given" (G. Eichholz, op. cit., 105). This word of the cross stands in absolute opposition to the "wisdom of this world" (1 Cor. 1:18–3:20), in that it makes nonsense of the → wisdom of this world and the boasting of those who claimed superior knowledge (1 Cor. 4:8), and it thereby stands in opposition to a theology of glory consonant with such a wisdom, where the cross and the Crucified One no longer have any place (cf. 1 Cor. 2:8).

The message of the decision given about the world on the cross is in its critical function as the "word of the cross" related to the typical Jew, who asks for proof of God's power, and to the typical Greek, who asks for divine wisdom (1 Cor. 1:22 ff.). The word of the cross, with its reference to the varying Jewish and Gk. preconceptions, does not merely signify here the correcting but the exploding of the prior understanding, since man "just does not comprehend the message along the lines of his prior understanding. For God does not confront him along the lines of such a prior understanding" (G. Eichholz, op. cit., 111; against R. Bultmann, op. cit.). However much the word of the cross, as the message of God's once-and-for-all decision in favour of the world given on the cross, is concretely related to its Jewish and Gk. hearers, it nevertheless destroys all their previously held misconceptions. The word of the cross is the central conception and criterion of the Pauline proclamation. But in that the word of the cross is at the same time "the word of life" (Phil. 2:16) – as the Crucified One is at the same time the Risen One – this word signifies the power of God and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24 ff.) for those Jews and Greeks who are called. For "Christ's death is not annulled by the resurrection and exaltation: rather it is held on to, made operative as a saving event in both judgment and deliverance, and so becomes the subject matter of preaching" (G. Bornkamm, Paul, 1971, 160).

(iii) The word of → reconciliation. The word of the cross is called "the word of reconciliation" by Paul in 2 Cor. 5:19. This word, which is passed on by the apostolic "ministry of reconciliation", is founded on the event of reconciliation in the death of Jesus "while we were yet sinners" (Rom. 5:8–10). The reconciliation, which is related to and embraces all men, is the Pauline development of the universal representative statements of the early church (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14, "one has died for all"), and is developed later on in Col. 1:19–22. This universal reconciliation of the world with God in the death of Christ establishes and grounds "the word of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5:19; cf. Col. 1:25), according to Paul, as the message of this event once and for all.

The word of reconciliation is to be distinguished from the reconciliation itself, as grounded in it; it is not that the event of the reconciliation of the world with God comes about further in the word of reconciliation, as though the word of Christian proclamation and the history which it communicates coincide, are indeed one (cf. R. Bultmann, op. cit., 305 ff.). By contrast with claims of a coincidence between NT kerygma (→ Proclamation, art. kēryssō) and the event proclaimed (Bultmann), Paul distinguishes between the historical event of the reconciliation of the world and the speaking event of the word of proclamation concerning this event. The word of reconciliation “looks back at a conclusive event that has already happened, and forward from this to the revelation of the conclusion which has already taken place in this event” (K. Barth, CD IV, 2, 204). On the other hand, commenting on the phrase “ministry of reconciliation” (2 Cor. 5:19), F. Büchsel writes, “Since the diakonia tēs katallagēs [ministry of reconciliation] has not yet come to an end, and the world has not yet heard the logos tēs katallagēs [word of reconciliation] in all its members, reconciliation itself must not be thought of as concluded” (TDNT I 257). The event of reconciliation in the death of Christ is neither to be separated from the event of proclaiming the word of reconciliation nor to be mediated along with this in the sense of a kerygmatic process; the “once-for-all” nature of the reconciliation is proclaimed as such in the word of reconciliation: it does not only become “once-for-all” in the word of reconciliation.

(iv) The word of promise. As Paul in Rom. 9:9 designates the word of election to Isaac as the word of God, so Christ, the Yes and the Amen of God’s promises (2 Cor. 1:19 f.), makes the word of proclamation an unambiguous word of salvation (2 Cor. 1:18). The representative death of Jesus Christ and the curse laid on him is the fulfilment and universalization of the word of promise given to → Abraham (Gal. 3:6–14; cf. Gen. 12:3; 15:6; 18:18), which retains its validity even for the Israel which rejected the messiah, so that the question as to the validity of the word of God in view of the rejection of the messiah by Israel becomes the keynote of Rom. 9–11: “But it is not as though the word of God had failed” (Rom. 9:6). As the word of → election stood over the history of Israel, so the word of → promise about the destruction of death stands over the world, and “then shall come to pass the saying that is written: ‘Death is swallowed up in victory’” (1 Cor. 15:54; cf. Isa. 25:8). For Paul, the question of the fulfilment, the honouring and the abiding validity of the OT word of promise means nothing less than that the whole perspicuity, trustworthiness and validity of the word of reconciliation and justification is itself at stake.

(v) Word of God and word of man. The word of God, which according to Paul is promulgated in the shape of the word of man, is thereby at the mercy of the possibility of being confused with other human words. This is why Paul thanks God that in the church at Thessalonica “when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers” (1 Thess. 2:13).

After Paul had been driven out of Philippi and come as an alien to Thessalonica, working hard of necessity to earn his living, he proclaimed the word of God to them without any attempt to impress by appearances (1 Thess. 1:9 f.). Paul consciously avoided proclaiming the word of God like the wandering apostles of the day with enthusiastic speech and in the presentation of their own spiritual power, by drawing on impressive words of wisdom or preaching with mixed motives, modifying or falsifying the word of God (1 Thess. 2:5; 1 Cor. 2:1, 4, 13; 2 Cor. 2:17; 4:2). Instead, and in order to legitimate the word of God, he pointed to his human → weakness (2 Cor. 2:9; cf. 10:10), and again in order to legitimate the word of the cross, he pointed to his persecution as a disciple of the cross (Gal. 6:17). Knowing the humanity of the word of God, Paul also instructed the church (1 Cor. 14:9, 19) to give precedence in worship to intelligible language rather than unintelligible indulgence of one's own possession of the Spirit (speaking in tongues). "But the primary and intrinsic secret to which the New Testament message directs us is that God's word has become one with man's word, that it has come to us and become understandable in a human word" (G. Bornkamm, "God's Word and Man's Word in the New Testament", Early Christian Experience, 1969, 4 f.).

(b) The Word of God as a Guaranteed Word of Promise: Hebrews. Having spoken repeatedly and in various ways through the prophets, God has in these last days spoken through his Son (Heb. 1:1–4). When God speaks thus in the Son as the final word of God which ushers in the turning-point of the ages, it is at the same time a summons not to miss the promised → rest (Heb. 4:1, 11). As a word of promise directed towards a coming fulfilment it is active and effective, like the "word of God" valid and promulgated by angels on Sinai (Heb. 2:2); where disdained it can bring death and judgment in so far as it is "sharper than any two-edged sword" (Heb. 4:12). This word of God, which had its beginning in the words of Jesus (Heb. 2:3) is decisively grounded in the exaltation of Jesus to the right hand of God (Heb. 1:5 ff.) and in his installation as eschatological high priest (Heb. 7:1 ff.).

This installation into the authority of the high priest, grounded in the divine "word of the oath" (Heb. 7:28; → Swear), is "the bringing in of a better hope" (Heb. 7:19 AV), and thus God's decisive word of promise, guaranteed by oath. But in that Heb. teaches that the Christ-event in cross and exaltation is to be understood as a guaranteed word of promise, open for coming fulfilment, it is also the effective summons to the church to hold fast to their confession of hope. As this "word of exhortation" (Heb. 13:22), the letter itself is directed to the church community, now grown weary in the face of the persecutions and sufferings which were to be expected. The authority of the High Priest crucified for the many is the eschatological word of God, which, as a grounded word of promise, is directed to its coming fulfilment and must be grasped for that reason (B. Klappert, Die Eschatologie des Hebräerbriefs, ThEH Neue Folge 156, 1969, 11, 22, 28 f., 31 f., 46, 61).

(c) The Word of God as the Apostolic Message of Christ: Acts. In Acts the absolute use of the "word of God" is already a regular periphrasis for the apostolic preaching (Acts 4:29; 6:2, 7; 8:4; 11:19; 13:5, 7, 44, 46; 16:32; 17:13; 18:11). This word of God proclaimed by the apostles, which can also be called "the word of the Lord" (Acts 8:25; 12:24; 13:49; 15:35 f.; 19:10, 20) and is "the word" which God sent to the children of Israel (Acts 10:36), has for its content the word-event of Jesus Christ, i.e. the history of the word (Acts 10:37, to genomenon rhēma) from its beginnings in Judea to the appearance of the Risen Christ and the sending out of the disciples. The apostolic word-event of proclamation is grounded in the word-event of the history of Jesus Christ (Acts 10:36 f.), and this is its normative subject-matter.

The apostolic message of Christ is therefore "the word of this salvation" (Acts 13:26), which is for both Jews and Greeks. This word of God, which God himself (Acts 17:30), or Jesus Christ, the Exalted One (Acts 13:38 f.; 26:23), proclaims is the word of the apostles Peter and John (Acts 8:25) and of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:5, 46; 14:25; 15:36; 17:13; 18:11). The word of God, to which Paul commends his congregation (Acts 20:32) is proved to be powerful (Acts 19:20), it grows and multiplies (Acts 6:7; 12:24), spreads throughout the whole land, and, according to the "words" of the Risen Christ (Acts 1:9), is to be proclaimed "in Jerusalem [cf. chs. 1–7], in all Judea and Samaria [cf. chs. 8–12] and to the end of the earth [cf. chs. 13–28]" (Acts 1:8). Acts closes (28:30 f.) with the reference to Paul proclaiming the kingdom of God and the gospel of Jesus Christ in Rome; it is thus the document of the powerful advance in history of the word of God, both in the foundational and illustrative nature of the apostolic preaching in Jerusalem and Judea, on the one hand (chs. 1–12), and in the world-wide mission of Paul, on the other (chs. 13–28). This word of God or word of the Lord in the apostolic preaching is spoken (cf. Acts 4:29, 31; 11:19, 13:46) and proclaimed (Acts 13:5; 15:36; 17:13), it is to be received (Acts 8:14; 17:11), i.e. heard as the word of God (Acts 4:4; 13:7; 44; 19:10), and to be accepted in faith and praised (Acts 4:4; 15:7; 13:48). If the content of the apostolic preaching is the message of the saving-event in Jesus Christ, it can be said of Acts that "The Word of God is the Word about Jesus" (G. Kittel, TDNT IV 116).

4. Jesus Christ as the Word. (a) The Understanding of the Word of God in the Johannine Literature. John's Gospel, like the Synoptics (cf., e.g. Mk. 4:14 ff.; Lk. 5:1), denotes Jesus' preaching as the proclamation "of the word [of God]": Jesus' words are those of the Father, in which the work of the Father is performed (Jn. 14:24; cf. 3:34; 14:10; 17:8). Anyone, therefore, who hears Jesus' words and accepts them in faith hears God's word (Jn. 5:24; 8:51; 12:48; 14:24; 15:3; 17:14, 17). Because Jesus' word is at the same time the word of the Father, it is therefore the word of salvation (Jn. 14:24) and of → truth (Jn. 17:17), and that is why Jesus' words effect → life in believers (Jn. 5:24) and → judgment in non-believers (Jn. 12:47 f.). The "words of God" which Jesus speaks, are in their totality God's self-revelation to men – "God's word", "thy word" (Jn. 14:6, 14, 17). But this is not to have mentioned the specifically Johannine understanding of the word of God in his Gospel; for "the words of the Revealer (sometimes called ta rhēmata, 3:34; 6:63, 68; 8:47; 12:47 f.; 14:10; 15:7; 17:8) are not identical with the revealer as 'the Word'" (R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel according to St John, I, 1968, 483). Over and above the statement that Jesus' word is the word of God, Jesus himself is called "the Word" (Jn. 1:1, 14). That is, Jesus' words (of proclamation) as the words of God are grounded in Jesus' being as the Word. "He is not called the Logos absolutely because he utters the word or words of God; on the contrary, his words rather have the force of God's words because he is the Logos, that is, the divine revealer and redeemer" (ibid.). This absolute and personal use of the Logos-concept in its identification with Jesus is found in addition to Jn. 1:1, 14 only in 1 Jn. 1:1 (Jesus as "the Word of life") and Rev. 19:13, where the name "the Word of God" is used for Christ as he returns in victory (combining Wis. 18:5 and Dan. 7).

(b) The understanding of the Word of God in the Johannine Prologue. (i) The original form of the Logos-hymn. In understanding the Johannine Logos-prologue (Jn. 1:1–18), it is important to see that this represents a commentary-like adaptation of an earlier Logos-hymn, which originally comprised vv. 1–4(5), 9–11, 14, 16 (R. Schnackenburg, op. cit., 224 ff.; E. Schweizer, Neotestamentica, 113 f.). It spoke of the incarnation of the Word in v. 14 only, and not in v. 5 (contra E. Käsemann, "The Structure and Purpose of the Prologue to John's Gospel", in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 138–67, see especially 150 ff.). Since v. 14 is a part of the original poem, representing in the incarnation of the Logos a genuinely Christian statement, it cannot stem from gnostic-Baptist circles, since it is utterly improbable that a pre-Christian hymn would have spoken of the incarnation of the Baptist (against R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 18). The original Christian hymn consists of four strophes and describes: (1) the divine Being of the Word and his function in creation (v. 1–3); (2) the function of this Word as light and life for the world of men (v. 4 f., 9); (3) the rejection of the Word and his work in the human world even before the incarnation (Jn. 10 f.); and (4) the complete surprise of the event of the Incarnation of the Word and its believing acceptance in the Christian community (vv. 14, 16).

As → wisdom vainly sought for a dwelling amongst men and returned to her heavenly place (Eth. Enoch 42:1 f.), so the original Christian hymn recounted the fate of the Word: the Logos, the true light which illuminates every man, by whom the world came to be, came to his own property but was not accepted by his own people (Jn. 1:5, 9–11). “As one shuts the door in the face of some unwelcome travelling stranger, so it turned out . . . with the divine Logos: people did not open up to him. They knew nothing of the fact that he had given the world its being; he was like a stranger, with whom one has nothing to do” (E. Haenchen, “Probleme des johanneischen Prologs”, in Gott und Mensch. Gesammelte Aufsätze, 1965, 131). Only in Jn. 1:14 does the hymn come to the actual statement of the incarnation of the Word, leaving the Wisdom-narrative far behind; “but now the Logos did the most that could be done, the final thing still possible; in order to gain acceptance among men, He became man himself” (v. 14, ibid.). The Incarnation of the Word is “the unprecedented thing to which the Wisdom-myth could offer no parallels” (ibid.).

(ii) The Prologue of John’s Gospel. In consequences of the incorporation of the commentary, and in particular of vv. 6–8 and 15 (12 f., 17 f.) with the Evangelist’s allusion to the appearance of John the Baptist, whereby vv. 5, 9–11 are no longer to be referred to the work of the Logos before his incarnation, but anticipate the Incarnate Logos, the Prologue of Jn. 1:1–18 is to be divided into three sections: (1) The pre-existent being of the Word (Jn. 1:1–4). “In the beginning” – not “at the beginning” of Creation (Gen. 1:1), but in the “time before time” of divine eternity – was the Word (pre-existence of the Word, Jn. 1:1), the Word was with God (personal reference, Jn. 1:2), indeed, “the Word was God” (essential divinity of the Word, Jn. 1:1). By this Word, whereby the universe was created, men have their life and the benefit of light (Jn. 1:3 f.). (2) The coming of the Word to the world of men and his incomprehensible rejection (Jn. 1:5–13). The Logos who came into the world, to whom John the Baptist bore witness (Jn. 1:6–8; in the Evangelist’s mind vv. 5 ff. thus already hint at the incarnation), was rejected by men in an incomprehensible way (Jn. 1:9–11), with the exception of those who came to faith and thus became children of God (Jn. 1:12 f.). (3) The event of the incarnation of the Word and its redeeming significance (Jn. 1:14–18). Without surrendering – indeed, rather, in the application of – his essential divinity, the Word became a mortal man (sarx), took up residence amongst men, and, as the presence of God’s glory with men, signified the gift of God’s grace and covenant faithfulness to them (Jn. 1:14, 16), surpassing the OT revelation of the word in the commandment and becoming event in Jesus Christ (Jn. 1:17 f.).

(iii) The religio-historical derivation of the Logos concept. The question as to the sphere from which Jn. adopted the term Logos, "the word", can even now not be answered with certainty.

(1) In Greek philosophy (cf. TDNT IV 79–91), in which "the word" plays a large part (according to Heraclitus: men do not comprehend this Logos, which always is, TDNT IV 81), and amongst the Stoics (cf. TDNT IV 84 f.; M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, 1959², 32 ff.), where the Logos is the "world-reason" which sustains and permeates the cosmos like a fine spiritual substance, the personal character of the Logos (Jn. 1:1 f.) and the thought of the world resisting the Logos (Jn. 1:10 f.) are both absent. (2) The attempt to derive the Logos-concept from the OT pure and simple, founders on the facts that, although the LXX can occasionally speak of the word of God as of an active force (cf. Ps. 147:15–18; Wis. 9:1), it does not speak of the word of Yahweh as a person; and that, although the proclamation of "the word of God" by Jesus is spoken of in the absolute in the NT outside the Johannine literature, Jesus himself is never spoken of as the Word of God (not even in 2 Cor. 1:19 f.; cf. T. Zahn, Introduction to the New Testament, III, 1909, 327 f., 330). Thus, the Johannine concept transcends the OT concept of the word. (3) In Jewish Wisdom-speculations, where → Wisdom participates in the creation of the world, she is sent into the world by God and rejected by men (Prov. 8:22–36; Sir. 24:3–12; Eth. Enoch 42:1 ff.). If Wisdom too has many conceptions and material statements parallel to Jn. 1:1 ff., yet not only the statement concerning the creation of Wisdom (otherwise in Jn. 1:1 f.), but also the fact that Jewish Wisdom literature cannot account for the choice of the term "Logos" (= "the Word") in Jn. 1:1 ff. speaks against a direct derivation of the Johannine Logos-concept from Jewish Wisdom-speculations. (4) The designation mēmra' (word) in the Targums appears as the Memra of Yahweh or Adonai, and always as an executive agent for God's activity, which preserves his transcendence; but it cannot be considered as a parallel, since there was never any hypostasis of "Memra" (SB II 302 ff.; V. Hamp, Der Begriff "Wort" in den aramäischen Bibelübersetzungen, 1938). It is equally improbable either that the statements concerning the Torah made by the rabbis (which are quite similar to those made concerning the Logos (SB II 353, ff.) are in fact parallels, or that Jn. 1:1 ff. is intended to be an antithesis directed against Torah-speculation (cf. G. Kittel TDNT IV 134 ff.), since the Logos-concept is lacking precisely in the antithetical vv. 1 and 17, and since it is not certain whether Jn. 1:17 ever belonged to the original hymn at all. (5) A gnostic derivation of the Logos-concept is doubtful not only because the myth of the descent of the Redeemer does not allow of certain proof of its pre-Christian origins (C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule, FRLANT Neue Folge 60, 1961), but also because the Logos concept by and large remained foreign to the gnostic systems (W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, [1913] 1970, 387 f.; J. Jeremias, "Zum Logos-Problem", ZNW 59, 1968, 83 ff.; R. Schnackenburg, op. cit., I, 229 ff., 238 ff., 543–57). (6) Hellenistic Judaism. Not only the rendering of Hab. 3:5 "plague goes in front of him" (JB; deber, plägue) in the Gk. translation of the LXX by "before him [God] will go the Logos [dāḅār]"; and not only Wis. 18:14 ff. (God's all-powerful Logos comes down from heaven to bring punishment and judgment on the Egyptians; J. Jeremias ZNW 59, 1968, 83 f.), but also Philo's Logos-doctrine provide the strongest contacts with the Johannine Logos-concept. In Philo not only is the Jewish Wisdom identified with the Logos, the Logos understood as a mediating power between God and the Creation and ascribed divine predicates, but Philo (e.g. De Cherubin 125 ff.; Spec. Leg. 1, 81; Leg. All. 3, 96) also simultaneously combines OT statements of creation by the word, Stoic statements of the Logos as the world-soul and Platonic elements (the Logos as the archetype of the created world) with one another (cf. R. Schnackenburg, op. cit., I, 235 ff.; TDNT IV 88 ff.). In the question of the origin of the Logos-concept, pre-eminent significance is therefore to be attributed to Hellenistic Judaism.

(iv) The Incarnation of the Word. What does the Johannine message of the incarnation of the Word (Jn. 1:1 ff.) signify within the compass of, and in antithesis to, this Hellenistic Judaic milieu? By contrast with its outlook (cf. Philo), according to which the divine Logos binds together the heavenly and earthly world and rules over and through both macrocosm and microcosm, the Good News of the Johannine Prologue consists in the fact that the Logos no longer works "spiritually" but is found embodied in a mortal man. It no longer embraces the whole world in a simultaneous transcendence and immanence in order to mediate salvation to it through inspiration, but the Logos "becomes one man among others, takes their sin to Himself" (C. Colpe, TDNT VIII 470; cf. Colpe, "New Testament and Gnostic Christology", in Religions in Antiquity. Essays in Memory of E. R. Goodenough, 1968, 227 ff., especially 235 f.). Thus the incarnation of the Word does not mean that Jesus in his pure humanity proclaims the eschatological word of God (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 35 f.; and Theology of the New Testament, II, 1955, 40–49, 59–69). Over against what is in point of fact a kenotic interpretation – i.e. one which eliminates the divinity of Jesus (H. J. Iwand, "Vom Primat der Christologie", in Antwort. Karl Barth zum siebzigsten Geburtstag, 1956, 181), and a replacement of the Word becoming flesh by a notion of the flesh becoming word (i.e. the earthly Jesus), one must formulate in the sense of the Johannine Prologue – not a genuine man, commissioned with God's eschatological call to decision, dwelt amongst us – but the Word, God himself (Jn. 1:1 f.) in his divine glory (Jn. 1:14 f.) who assumes the full reality of historical objectivity, human transience (sarx) and human death (Jn. 1:14a; cf. 6:61, 63; 1:29; 1 Jn. 3:5; Rom. 8:3). Or, with Schniewind's pertinent phraseology, "Even the prologue speaks of the Cross" (in H.-J. Kraus, Julius Schniewind. Charisma der Theologie, 1965, 202). The incarnation of the Word thus does not mean Jesus as the eschatological ambassador, in whom God is present and acting (pace Bultmann); it signifies the presence of God himself in the flesh. A religious historical parallel to this statement will for this reason never be found (cf. C. Colpe, TDNT IV 470). The message of the incarnation of the Word (Jn. 1:14) "is more and other than the historicising of a mythological event" (ibid.). In other words, the incarnation of the Word means the presence of God in the person of Jesus, not just the present activity of God in the words of Jesus.

5. Cognates. Of the various cognates found in the NT, the most important is the group connected with eklektos, chosen, elect (→ Elect). Otherwise, the terms are comparatively rare. Apollos is described in Acts 18:24 as an anēr logios which may mean "an eloquent man" (RSV) or "a learned man" (TDNT IV 137). The former is supported by v. 25 and possibly by the picture of Apollos in 1 Cor. 1:12; 3:5. But too much cannot be read into these latter passages, as the Apollos faction might equally have been attracted by his learning, and in any case Apollos may not have been responsible for the formation of the faction.

logion in the LXX is used for an oracular saying (Num. 24:4, 16), individual sayings (Isa. 28:13), and the commandments (Deut. 33:9), but frequently as a general statement about the word of God (e.g. Isa. 5:24; Pss. 19[18]:4; 107[106]:11; 119[118]:154–69 [22 times in all]; 148[147]:15). In Acts 7:38 Moses is said to have received “living oracles [logia zōnta]”, i.e. the Torah or perhaps more especially the Decalogue (cf. Deut. 32:46 f.). In Rom. 3:2 Paul lists among the advantages of the Jews the fact that they were entrusted with the “oracles of God [logia tou theou]” (cf. Rom. 15:8). But in neither case did these advantages turn out to be an abiding benefit, for the Jews did not use them for salvation. The readers of Heb. 5:12 are rebuked for needing instruction in “the first principles of God’s word [stoicheia tēs archēs tōn logiōn tou theou]”, which evidently implies a failure to grasp not only the OT revelation but the Word of God in Jesus Christ, for “in these last days” God “has spoken to us by a Son” (Heb. 1:2). In the context of an exhortation to employ gifts for one another “as good stewards of God’s varied grace” (1 Pet. 4:10), Peter urges: “whoever speaks, as one who utters oracles of God” (v. 11). Here logia theou, which is used elsewhere to describe the oracles of God in the OT and in Heb. 5:12 of Jesus Christ, is used of charismatic utterance. The phrase contains the implication that some charismatic utterances were less than edifying. It would appear to rule out not only speaking in tongues but any kind of unedifying pronouncement. E. Best sees the phrase “whoever speaks” as including “whether as prophet, preacher or teacher in the worship, instruction or mission of the community, or as an individual privately encouraging, evangelizing or rebuking another Christian, or even a pagan” (1 Peter, New Century Bible, 1971, 160). Hence, the speaker is urged not to give his own opinions or be motivated by self-esteem but to speak what is given to him as God’s word to the glory of God (v. 11c).

alogos is found in cl. Gk. meaning both dumb and without reason (TDNT IV 141). In Acts 25:27 it has the latter sense, but in 2 Pet. 2:12 and Jude 10 either or both senses are possible.

logikos is found in secular Gk. meaning “belonging to speech” and “belonging to reason”, “rational”. In this latter sense it is found in Gk. philosophy, especially the Stoics (TDNT IV 142). Man is a zōon logikon, “a rational being” (Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 9, 2; M. Ant., 2, 16, 6; cf. 55, 4; Philo, Abr. 32, where there may be overtones of “spiritual”). In 1 Pet. 2:2 the RSV translates logikos “spiritual”: “Like newborn babes, long for the pure spiritual milk [logikon adolon gala], that by it you may grow up to salvation.” E. Best prefers this sense to either “of the word” (AV), though he admits that this is the natural meaning of the context (cf. 1 Pet. 1:23 ff.; cf. also Jas. 1:21), or “reasonable” (RVmg), “rational” which is the normal meaning among Gk. philosophers (op. cit., 98). Best thinks that the latter meaning would suit Rom. 12:1, but finds it difficult to see how it would fit 1 Pet. 2:2. However, it may be suggested that there may be an intended paradox or contrast between milk as the food of babes and the rational word which, when fed upon, leads to maturity (cf. v. 2b). Best, like G. Kittel (TDNT IV 142), prefers “spiritual” as the meaning both here and in Rom. 12:1, seeing parallels in the later gnostic writings which allude to spiritual, i.e. non-material, sacrifices (Corp. Herm. 1, 31; 13, 18 and 21). The RSV uses “spiritual” in its rendering of Rom. 12:1: “I appeal to you therefore brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship [tēn logikēn latreian hymōn].” This meaning would fit the context, where Christian worship is set over against Jewish conceptions of religion. But the word may have been chosen both here and in 1 Pet. because of its ambiguity and overtones of both “spiritual” and “rational”. For in Rom. Paul may well be emphasizing the need for charismatic worship to express itself in forms which were at once spiritual and rational. In the context of ch. 12 Paul returns to the subject of gifts (vv. 6 ff., cf. vv. 3 ff.), and the need for worship to be given a rational and practical expression may well be a counterpart to his treatment of charismatic worship in ch. 8 (→ Prayer, art. entynchanō).

The vb. logomacheō and the noun logomachia each occur in the Pastoral Epistles. 1 Tim. closes with a warning about contentious teachers: “If any one teaches otherwise and does not agree with the sound words of our Lord Jesus Christ and the teaching which accords with godliness, he is puffed up with conceit, he knows nothing; he has a morbid craving for controversy and for disputes about words [alla nosōn peri zētēseis kai logomachias], which produce envy, dissension, slander, base suspicions, and wrangling among men who are depraved in mind and bereft of the truth, imagining that godliness is a means of gain” (1 Tim. 6:3 ff.). Similarly, 2 Tim. 2:14 urges Timothy to “Remind them of this, and charge them before the Lord to avoid disputing about words [mē logomachein], which does no good, but only ruins the hearers.” These passages evidently refer to those who in 1 Tim. 1:4 occupied themselves with → myths and endless → genealogies (cf. also 1 Tim. 4:3; 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:14–18; Tit. 1:14 ff.; 3:9). The precise nature of the teaching is obscure, though it would seem to be some form of gnosticizing Judaism. Myths and genealogies were already linked in Plato (Tim. 22a; cf. Polybius 9, 2, 1). In the early church Irenaeus notes a link between them among the heretics (Haer. 1, 30, 9; cf. also Preface; Tertullian, De Praesc. 33; see further M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 16 ff., 83 ff., 110 ff.).

ῥῆμα (rhēma), word, utterance, thing, matter, event, case.

CL The noun rhēma (root wer- or rhē; cf. erō, I will say; rhēsis, statement, discourse, explanation; rhētōr, orator; cognates Lat. verbum, Ger. Wort and Eng. word) means that which is stated intentionally: a word, an utterance. It was used in poetry from Pindar onwards (Pyth. 4, 277 f.) and in prose from Hdt. onwards (7, 162). In the famous epigram of Simonides (Frag. 92; E. Diehl, Anthologia Lyrica Graeca, 1925, II, 94) for the battle of Thermopylae it is said that the Spartans fell in obedience to commands (rhēmata). In Plato rhēma denotes an individual word (Tim. 49c) but also a sentence (Leg. 840c). In grammar rhēma means a verb as distinct from an onoma, a noun (Aristotle, Poet. 20p, 1457a, 11).

OT 1. In the LXX rhēma occurs predominantly for Heb. dābār, word, thing, which is of course chiefly rendered by → logos; above all in the prophetic books. However, rhēma is found 147 times in the Pentateuch and frequently in Deut. and the Deuteronomistic historical works. The double meaning of dābār, as word and thing, has thus coloured the use of rhēma, which can therefore mean both (a) word, utterance as well as (b) matter, event, case. rhēma appears as the result of things said and of things done. Indeed, the latter meaning turns the scale (cf. 1 Sam. 18:8).

(a) rhēma, word, utterance, is often synonymous with → logos (cf. e.g. the alternation of both terms in Exod. 34:27 f.; 2 Sam. 14:20 f.; 1 Ki. 12:24; 11:41 v.l.). As determined by the context, it means, e.g., the word of prayer (Pss. 5:2; 17[16]:6) and in the plur. the message of the spheres (Ps. 19[18]:5). Frequently it is the word of God: a single utterance (Exod. 19:6), a command (Deut. 13:1), the creative word (Deut. 8:3), or a directive oracle (1 Sam. 3:1). Formulaic are the phrases which indicate obedience “according to the word of the LORD” (e.g. 1 Ki. 12:24; 15:29) and “doing this word” (Deut. 24:18, 20, 22). The plur. occasionally denotes the commandments in general (Deut. 28:58), then the Ten Commandments (Exod. 34:1, 27 f.; otherwise in Deut. 10:4), the content of the Shema “Hear, O Israel” (Deut. 6:6), the revelation of the word at Sinai (Deut. 4:36) and the admonitions of Wisdom (Sir. 39:6; Wis. 6:25). rhēma, word, can also be used for the process of inspiration (Num. 23:5, 16, God puts the word into the mouth of the pagan Balaam) and in the phrase “the word of the LORD came to . . .” (Israel’s prophets: Samuel, 1 Sam. 15:10; Elijah, 1 Ki. 17:2, 8; 18:1; Jeremiah, Jer. 1:1); but → logos is mainly used for this.

(b) rhēma, thing, matter (likewise logos, 2 Sam. 1:4; 17:4) is more specifically defined by the context as an action (Gen. 22:16; Deut. 15:10; 23:10), a legal case (Exod. 18:26; Deut. 1:17), an event (Deut. 4:32) or thought (Deut. 15:9). The double meaning of rhēma as event and account is shown where the chronicle of the acts of → Solomon is called biblion rhēmatōn Salōmōn, 1 Ki. 11:41; but logoi stands more commonly for such chronicles (e.g. 2 Ki. 14:15 f.; 15:11–36). In the narrative portions of the Pentateuch there appears the copulative construction “after these things”, “after this” (meta ta rhēmata tauta e.g. Gen. 15:1; 22:1).

2. In post-biblical Judaism at the time of Jesus the Heb. term dābār corresponding with the Gk. rhēma is used much as in the OT.

(a) In the Dead Sea Scrolls dābār can be found with much the same frequency, meaning (i) word and (ii) thing, matter, the former esp. in hymnic and exegetical fragments, the latter in legal stipulations.

(i) The human word and the faculty of speech are held to be particular miracles of the divine creation (1QH 1:28 f.). But dābār also means the word of God, his commandment (1QS 5:14, 19, 1QH 4:35) and his promise (1QS 2:13). The word of the prophets (CD 7:10; 8:20) is the object of the actualizing interpretation by the Teacher of Righteousness (1Qp Hab 2:5–9; 7:4–8).

(ii) dābār, meaning affair, concern, is the object of consultations in the community (1QS 6:1, 4, 16), and then also a matter which is elicited by exegesis (1QS 8:11 f.).

(b) In Philo rhēma is completely overshadowed by → logos, and – in a genuinely Gk. way – simply means “word”, and in grammar “verb” (Agric. 136). Otherwise, it is used in distinction from a thought or deed. Following Exod. 20:18, Philo says that what God speaks are not words but works (Decal. 47).

(c) In rabbinic literature dābār, like the Aram. terms millāh or mill’ā, derived from other roots, has the same meanings of word and matter; in the Targums mēmārā, word, appears as a periphrasis for the God who reveals himself.

(i) dābār means an individual word, an utterance. As well as the spirit, the soul and the senses, man has received the word of the mouth as something which constitutes his nature as a man (B. Nidd. 31a). Warnings are however given against loquaciousness: this leads to sin (Aboth 1, 17). In the practice of teaching, the dābār is associated with the all-dominant Torah. The “words of the Torah” are distinguished from the “words of the tradition” (qabbālāh), i.e. the biblical books apart from the Pentateuch (B. Nidd. 23a), and from the “words of the scribes”, i.e. the decisions of the rabbis (Yeb. 9, 3). The latter, however, can also be called the “words of the living God” (B. Erub. 13b), i.e. they receive the exposition intended by God. The frequent exegetical phrase “another word [or matter]” introduces a further, divergent interpretation.

The word of divine revelation is readily designated by the nomen actionis dibbūr or dibb'rāh, derived from the vb. dibber; this is the case for the Ten Commandments (Mekilta on Exod. 20:2). There was much speculation amongst the rabbis as to the universal effect of the giving of the law on Sinai; every single word (dibbūr) which came from the mouth of God divided into seventy languages, each single word filled the universe, put the souls of the hearers to flight and drove the Israelites back twelve miles (B. Shab 88b). With the election of Israel, all other lands were excluded as places of revelation (dibb'rôt) (Mek. on Exod. 12:1). Study discloses the riches of the revelation: as there are many smaller waves in between the wave crests in the sea, so there are many finer points in between the individual words of the Torah (Yalkuṭ 971). The word of revelation can be conceived in terms of personification (J. Shab. 7, 10c; cf. beginning of Lev.R. 1).

(ii) Meaning “matter” or “thing”, dābār appears in the common introductory question: “A parable. What is the thing like?” dābār is used many times as a general designation for legal cases, and occasionally also for human beings (B. Sotah 28b). The formula “another matter” is used to indicate things which one would not like to mention by name, such as idolatry (B. Shab. 17b), pigs (B. Shab. 129a), or sexual intercourse (B. Ber. 8b).

NT In the NT the term rhēma occurs 67 times, especially in the Lucan writings (32 times) and in Jn.’s Gospel (12 times). The meaning “word” predominates, which is grounded not least in the non-legal and kerygmatic character of the NT. The meaning “matter” is rare (see below, 5).

Whereas → logos can often designate the Christian → proclamation as a whole in the NT, rhēma usually relates to individual words and utterances: man has to render account for every unjust word (Matt. 12:36); Jesus answered Pilate without a single word (Matt. 27:14); the heavenly ones speak unutterable words (2 Cor. 12:4).

For rhēma as the word of God’s prophecy, it is characteristic that it is attended by its fulfilment (→ Fullness, art. pleroō) and becomes fact, in the double sense of dābār, which gains significance particularly in the messianic age.

1. For Luke the basic principle is: “With God nothing is impossible” (Lk. 1:37; cf. Gen. 18:14, Matt. 19:26); he may also have understood rhēma as the word of → promise, which does not remain unfulfilled (cf. Lk. 2:29). The Christmas message (Lk. 1:38; 2:17), proclaimed by an angel, is thus God’s word, to which one bows in trust and obedience and of which one lives to see the realization (Lk. 2:15, 17, 19). The preaching of John the Baptist makes this clear. Whereas for the rabbis prophecy was extinct, Luke applies the legitimating formula for a prophetic word – “the word of the Lord came . . .” – to the Baptist (Lk. 3:2), who, as the messenger of the messiah, was more than a prophet (Lk. 7:26 f.), and even before his death saw his prediction become reality (Lk. 7:22 f.; cf. Simeon in 2:29). In this sense even the words of Jesus are designated by the noun rhēma in Lk. Anyone who believes and obeys him and, like Peter, throws out the net in response to his word, sees its fulfilment (Lk. 5:5–8). Certainly, Jesus' word is not always immediately understood (Lk. 2:50; cf. 20:26), and this is particularly true of the predictions of suffering (Lk. 18:34; cf. Mk. 9:32 par. Matt. 17:23, Lk. 9:45; cf. Jn. 12:16); but the later realization awakes the memory and discloses the connexion between word and event (Lk. 24:8; Acts 11:16; cf. Mk. 14:72 par. Matt. 26:75, Lk. 22:62; cf. Jn. 18:16 ff., 25 ff.; Mk. 14:30).

2. In Acts the plur. rhēmata relates to Stephen's critique of → law and → temple, condemned as blasphemous (Acts 6:11, 13), and positively to the apostolic witness of the Christ-event proclaimed in the speeches (Acts 2:14; 5:20; 10:22, 44; cf. 26:25). Here, too, there emerges the unity of word and object in the term rhēma. For even the individual events of the Christ-event are denoted as rhēmata (Acts 5:32; 13:42), and the double aspect of the rhēma-concept is matched by the double testimony of the apostles who are eye-witnesses of the facts to which they bear witness by the word (Acts 5:32).

3. In St. John's Gospel the unity of Jesus' word and God's word is expressly established; Jesus speaks "the words of God" (Jn. 3:34; cf. 8:47; 14:10; 17:8). What the pious Jew expects from the Torah (→ Law) can be applied to the words of Jesus: they are → spirit and → life (Jn. 6:63), i.e. they are inspired and not (for instance) the words of a madman (Jn. 10:21), they give eternal life (Jn. 6:68) to those who accept them (Jn. 17:8) and who keep them in themselves (Jn. 15:7). The divine authority of these words rests on the sending of Jesus (Jn. 3:34) and especially on his sonship (Jn. 3:35; 17:8). This means, in practice, that Jesus' words are accompanied by his work, for the Father who abides in Jesus performs his works (Jn. 14:10).

4. In Paul and the post-Pauline literature, this equation of Jesus' words and God's word is matched by the correlation between → gospel and OT prophecy (Rom. 1:2–4).

What was said in Deut. 30:12–14 concerning the word of the Torah is, according to Paul, to be understood as a pointer to the message of justification through Christ: it is, for the believer, the word which is near, which is given to him and which saves him (Rom. 10:8), but which, like the song of praise of the spheres, is carried by its messengers into the furthest corners of the earth (Rom. 10:18 = Ps. 19:5). Paul can designate the glad tidings of the gospel as the "word of Christ" (Rom. 10:17), for which "word of God" is found in some MSS.

In 1 Pet. 1:24 f., the identification of both dimensions is achieved by relating Isa. 40:8 ("the word of the Lord endures for ever") to the gospel. In 2 Pet. 3:2 a reminder is given of the words of the prophets and of the instructions of the Lord proclaimed by the apostles; in the parallel passage Jude 17, however, it is simply the words of the → apostles of Jesus Christ which are mentioned.

5. rhēma, meaning thing, matter, appears in Lk. 2:15, 19 and there refers to the Christmas events. Many times in the NT, reference is made to the legal provision of Deut. 19:15, whereby a legal matter (rhēma) is to be binding on the basis of the evidence of two or three witnesses. Whereas in Matt. 18:16 this provision is impressed upon the community as a community rule (cf. 1QS 6:1), and is applied by Paul in a quite wilful manner to his judicial decisions in community affairs (2 Cor. 13:1), John has related it to → proclamation (Jn. 8:17): the truth which comes from God, to which Christ bears witness, is presented as the single evidence of two witnesses being heard in the forum of the world.

Language and Meaning in Religion

Biblical scholars have always regarded the study of language as a necessary part of the task of arriving at the meaning of the biblical text. However, today it is more widely recognized that it is of value to the student of the Bible and Christian theology to study not only traditional grammar and lexicography but also the phenomenon of language as such, seen as a particular form of human behaviour. Three distinct areas of research contribute to an understanding of language. (i) Modern general linguistics begins, in effect, with the work of Ferdinand de Saussure. Saussure views language as a structural system in the social life of the community, which operates on the basis of convention (or more strictly, an “arbitrary” relation to the world → 1 (b)). The value of linguistics for biblical studies has recently been demonstrated by James Barr, R. Kieffer, Erhardt Güttgemanns, and others (→ 5 (c) below). (ii) Linguistic philosophy in Britain and America has also contributed to our understanding of language. Here the insights and methods of the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein have special importance. Like Saussure, in his later writings he approached language as a social phenomenon belonging to human life, but he also paid special attention to the varied functions which language could perform in relation to different settings and forms of life. Several philosophers of religion have explored the possible implications of this perspective for the language of Christian faith (→ below 4). (iii) A third distinctive approach to language has connexions with the work of Herder and Wilhelm von Humboldt, but finds particular expression in the philosophy of Martin Heidegger and Hans-Georg Gadamer. Many British and American linguistic philosophers dismiss Heidegger’s approach out of hand. But even apart from its considerable influence on German theology, there is also an increasingly strong protest that more serious attempts must be made at constructive dialogue between the perspectives of Wittgenstein and Heidegger. In the present discussion we shall take account of all three areas of thought.

1. The Nature of Language and its Power. (a) Language does not merely articulate and express thoughts which are already present, fully formed, to the mind. (i) Words stimulate thought, and influence both how and what men think. At the same time they do not operate at an intellectual level only. They do not merely convey information from one mind to another. They may also serve to arouse passions, or, equally, to channel or to subdue them. Poetic language may open up a vision in which imagination and emotions have full play. Still further, language moulds character and directs men’s actions. Words may provoke a whole nation to determined action, or else persuade men towards an attitude of passive acceptance. (ii) In the context of certain accepted conventions and social institutions, the speaking of words may effectively perform certain specific actions. To say “I do” (in the appropriate situation) may be to marry a wife. To say “I hereby appoint . . .” may be to put someone in charge of a national budget or an army. There can be no question that words not only say; they also do (→ below (c)). (iii) More even than this, they also bring the individual into relation with the community. Historically, they provide him with access to the accumulated wisdom of past generations. Through language he can draw on the intellectual and spiritual resources of many centuries of human experience. Geographically, through writing or the broadcast word, the individual may gain access to the wisdom and culture of communities otherwise widely separated. Personally, through everyday talk, the individual develops his own character and outlook in inter-relation with the community within which he lives.

(b) But on what basis does language have the power to effect all this? From at least the time of Plato, Gk. philosophers debated whether language operates on the basis of “nature” or “convention”. Plato reports that Cratylus argued that all words were naturally appropriate to the things they signified. Onomatopoeia might seem to confirm such a view: cymbals crash, and bees buzz. But a moment’s reflection will serve to remind us that very few of our words are onomatopoeic. Furthermore, a number of considerations point firmly to the conclusion that the relationship between the forms of words and what they mean is quite simply (to use Saussure’s word) “arbitrary”. (i) Different forms occur in different languages. If “sister” has a natural relation to sisters, how could the same thing be claimed for “Schwester” or for “soeur”? Sometimes one language uses two words (French “à bon marché”) where another uses one word (English “cheap”). (ii) In any case words change their meanings as the years pass. If the meaning of a word is a “natural” one at one particular stage of its history, it will not be so at another. (iii) Grammatical structure, at least in the traditional sense of “grammar”, also varies from language to language. The arbitrariness of “surface” grammar is notorious in linguistic philosophy. For example, the sentence “a round square does not exist” does not predicate a given quality (non-existence) of some entity described as a “round square”. Its logical structure is, rather: “it is false to assert that an entity exists of which ‘round’ and ‘square’ can be predicated simultaneously.” The fallacy of a supposed parallelism between logic and “surface grammar” has been attacked by many writers, from Bertrand Russell to Noam Chomsky. (iv) Many single linguistic forms have multiple meanings (polysemy, e.g. floor board, and board and lodging); whilst two words of different meaning may both have the same linguistic form (homonymy). Thus Saussure rightly insists that the arbitrary character of the linguistic sign is the very first principle of all language-study. This principle “dominates all the linguistics of language; its consequences are numberless” (F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, 1960, 68; cf. A. C. Thiselton, “Semantics and New Testament Interpretation”, in I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977, 87–8). By claiming that language functions on the basis of convention, however, it is not suggested that a language-community consciously decides to adopt certain linguistic conventions by formal agreement. It is merely to assert that accepted social habit in the use of language is ultimately the only basis on which any relation between given linguistic forms and given linguistic meanings may be said to rest. Such habit may certainly also admit of change; but only if this change becomes effectively accepted by a language-using community.

(c) If language rests on social habit, does this mean that the biblical writers imply a mistaken view of human language, especially when they speak of its power? O. Procksch holds that according to Heb. thought “the word appears as a material force which is always present and at work” (TDNT IV 93). Gerhard von Rad argues that word in the OT is “an objective reality endowed with mysterious power” (Old Testa- ment Theology, II, 1965, 85). More seriously, he claims that Heb. man was “unable properly to differentiate between word and object, idea and actuality” (op. cit., 81). It is perhaps less surprising to find such a verdict in J. Pedersen: “No distinction is made between word and the matter described” (Israel: its Life and Culture, I–II, 1926, 167 f.). L. Dürr insists that the OT writers see words as power-laden (kraftgeladen) forces (Die Wertung des göttlichen Wortes im Alten Testament und im antiken Orient, 1938, 52, 61, 71). Finally, following Dürr and Grether, H. Ringgren also argues that the word is “a concrete substance . . . acting so to speak mechanically” (H. Ringgren, Word and Wisdom, 1947, 158).

From the point of view of modern linguistics, this is not, as G. von Rad claims, a “richer” view of language. It is simply a mistaken one. The central point of the so-called “general semantics” of the Alfred Korzybski school is that “the word is not the thing”; and modern linguistics as well as modern philosophy convincingly demonstrates both the correctness and the importance of this principle. If the OT writers did indeed hold this view of language, it would be due only to the primitiveness and cultural relativity of their outlook. Their view would be akin to that of the phenomenon of word-magic, as described by E. Cassirer and by B. Malinowski. Cassirer asserts that in primitive word-magic men believe in “the essential identity between the word and what it denotes” (Language and Myth, 1946, 49 f. and 58). J. Piaget, Karl Bühler, and E. Durkheim discuss this phenomenon with reference to primitive cultures and young children.

Elsewhere, in another article, I have examined and attacked in detail the claim that this view of language is in fact found in the OT (A. C. Thiselton, “The Supposed Power of Words in the Biblical Writings”, JTS New Series 25, 1974, 283–99). The main part of my case turns on four arguments. (i) This view cannot draw support from the fact that the Heb. word dāḥār can mean both word and thing. Such an argument rests on a misunderstanding of the significance of polysemy, or multiple meaning, in language. (ii) More important, arguments have been put forward about a Heb. view of the nature of language as such on the basis of passages from the OT which speak about the power of words spoken by God. Words spoken by the God of Israel (or in the ancient Near East, by Marduk or Atum) have power precisely because of the identity of the speaker, who will perform what he has spoken. (iii) Special examples of such “power-laden” formulae as blessing and cursing are better understood on the basis of analogies with performative utterances in modern language-study than as examples of primitive word-magic. J. L. Austin showed that performative language indeed does things (e.g. “I do” in marriage; “I baptize . . .” in baptism; “I give and bequeath . . .” in making a will); but that the effectiveness of the utterance rests on the existence of certain accepted procedures, not on natural causal force. (iv) OT scholars were encouraged to find this so-called “dynamic” view of language in the Bible not least because they regarded an ideational and intellectualist view as the only possible alternative. In point of fact, neither of these two views gives an adequate or even correct account of language at all. To these four main arguments we may add a fifth consideration. Counter-examples can be found in both the OT and NT which stress the weakness of words as well as their power. It is recognized (especially in Prov.) that words are no substitute for deeds, and that they cannot alter facts. In the NT the gospel comes not in word only but in power (1 Cor. 2:4; 4:19, 20).

We may conclude with confidence that the view of the nature and power of language found in modern linguistics and philosophy is correct, and that this in no way conflicts with the view of language presupposed by the OT and NT. Indeed the modern stress on the variety of different functions which language performs is well demonstrated by its range of functions and effects within the biblical writings.

2. Language and Thought. The modern debate about the relation between language and thought often gives rise to misunderstanding. At one extreme there stands the theory of Benjamin Lee Whorf that language decisively influences not only human thought in general, but most specifically man's view of the world. At the other extreme, some exponents of the emphasis on convention in linguistics argue that linguistic forms are merely a matter of accident, and have little or no bearing on thought. The position taken in the present discussion is that both sides are (to some extent) correct in what they are trying to assert, but that the debate is artificially polarized by a failure to make it clear whether what is under discussion is linguistic form or linguistic content.

(a) There is no doubt that Saussure and his successors in general linguistics are correct when they urge that many features of language are arbitrary and accidental, and that often these features have little or nothing to do with theories about the world-view of particular language-communities. This principle is extremely relevant to biblical studies. T. Boman, for example, has strongly urged that on the basis of certain peculiarities of grammar and vocabulary, Israelite thinking is "dynamic, vigorous, passionate", whilst Gk. thinking is "static, peaceful, moderate, harmonious" (Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek, 1960, 27). To illustrate he argues that even the Heb. concept of number is more dynamic than the Gk., because, for instance the Heb. word for "two" comes from the verbal form šānāh, meaning "to repeat" (165). James Barr has rightly attacked Boman's arguments, drawing on principles which are accepted axioms in linguistics (The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961). By way of illustration we may cite two characteristic statements made by writers on general linguistics which relate, respectively, to questions about grammar and vocabulary-stock.

(i) On the question of grammatical form, E. A. Nida observes; "The idea that the Heb. people had a completely different view of time because they had a different verbal system does not stand up under investigation. It would be just as unfounded to claim that people of the English-speaking world have lost interest in sex because the gender distinctions in nouns and adjectives have been largely eliminated, or that Indo-Europeans are very time conscious because in many languages there are time-distinctions in the verbs. But no people seems more time-orientated than the Japanese, and their verbal system is not too different from the aspectual structure of Hebrew. Furthermore, few peoples are so little interested in time as some of the tribes of Africa, many of whose languages have far more time distinctions than any Indo-European language has" ("The Implications of Contemporary Linguistics for Biblical Scholarship" JBL 91, 1972, 83). Nida stresses the arbitrariness of such grammatical features.

(ii) On the questions of vocabulary-stock, reference may be made in the first place to L. Hjelmslev's table of kinship terms. Hungarian has separate words for "elder brother" and "younger brother", whilst Malay has only one word for both "brother" and "sister". But this certainly does not mean that those who speak only Malay can have no “concept” of an elder brother. It simply means that in that language the idea is expressed by a phrase rather than a word. Thus the linguist David Crystal rightly warns us that it is false to argue: “Language X has a word for it, but Y has not; therefore X can say something Y cannot”. He comments, “This fallacy stems from the misconception . . . that the unit of translation-equivalence between languages is the word. . . . The fact that Y has no word for an object does not mean that it cannot talk about that object. It cannot use the same mechanical means to do so, but it can utilize alternative forms of expression in its own structure for the same end” (D. Crystal, Language, Linguistics, and Religion, 1965, 144).

(b) Does this mean that Whorf’s theory is wholly wrong? Whorf does not deny the conventionality of language. The heart of his claim is that “language is not merely a reproducing instrument for voicing ideas, but rather is itself the shaper of ideas. . . . We dissect nature along lines laid down by our native languages”. We “organize it into concepts” precisely on the basis of the conventions presupposed by our particular language (Language, Thought, and Reality: Selected Writings of Benjamin Lee Whorf, 1956, 212 and 214). Thus it is sometimes said, for example, that Eskimo peoples see the world in a distinctive way because of their range of words for degrees or kinds of whiteness. Whorf’s view of language stems originally from Wilhelm von Humboldt, but it also has affinities with that of Sapir, Lichtenberg, and even Heidegger and Gadamer. The truth which this outlook expresses is that language hands on a particular tradition, or habits of thought, in which it is easier or more difficult to acquire certain perspectives. But this does not mean that each national language has its own logic, or that inter-translation is impossible. Indeed it in no way undermines the wholly valid claims of Nida, Crystal, and Barr, about the arbitrary nature of surface-grammar and vocabulary-stock.

(c) The two approaches must be held together, with the added proviso that extreme caution must be shown towards Whorf’s specific theories about relations between particular language and particular world-views. Thus Max Black rightly warns us against an over-ready acceptance of his theories about the world-view of the Hopi Indians (The Labyrinth of Language, 1968, 63–90). The issue turns on whether what is in question is what Wittgenstein calls the “physical properties” of language, or language-uses. Gadamer makes a parallel distinction between “language in the way that philologists see it” and “what is said or handed down in this language” (Truth and Method, 1975, 400). Barr, Nida and Crystal are wholly correct if we are thinking about language in the sense of philology. But if what is at issue is deeper questions about language-habits that determine logical grammar or deep grammar, then Whorf and more especially Heidegger and Gadamer also express an important truth. Heidegger insists that the way we use language influences our view of what is true. Wittgenstein urges that certain “pictures” conveyed in language may hold us captive and paralyze our thinking. Thus when Heidegger and Wittgenstein insist (each in his own different way) that language influences thinking, this valid insight does not conflict with the claim of Barr and Nida that thinking is not decisively influenced by accidents of surface-grammar and vocabulary-stock. This point is often misunderstood. For example, on this basis D. O. Via attacks J. Barr for holding a view which he does not in fact hold (The Parables, 1967, 48).

3. Language and Meaning: Word and Speech-act. (a) One of the oldest and most persistent theories is the referential theory of meaning. Often two principles are held together: (1) that the meaning of a word is the object to which the word refers; and (2) that even within broader stretches of language the word itself still remains the basic unit of meaning. Sometimes the term “semantics” is misleadingly tied to a referential theory of meaning. This stems largely from the practice of Charles W. Morris, according to which “semiotics”, or the science of meaning, is divided into the three areas of: syntax (the inter-relationship between linguistic signs); semantics (according to Morris, the relationship between words and their referents); and pragmatics (the use of language in life). Alfred Tarski and Rudolf Carnap also tend to adopt this view of semantics, and it persists even in recent works (e.g. A. Grabner-Haider, Semiotik und Theologie. Religiöse Rede zwischen analytischer und hermeneutischer Philosophie, 1973). The plausibility of this theory of meaning lies partly in the fact that we assume all too readily that meanings are learned on the basis of ostensive definition (i.e. pointing to an object and stating its name).

(i) The theory of reference, as a matter of principle, however, has grave difficulties, at least if it is offered as a comprehensive theory of meaning (→ A. C. Thiselton, Language, Liturgy, and Meaning, 1975, 10–13). A child understands the procedure of ostensive definition only when he has received a certain measure of linguistic training. L. Wittgenstein demonstrates this decisively in his Blue and Brown Books and Philosophical Investigations. The key difficulty, he explains, is that ostensive definition can be interpreted in all sorts of ways, unless the one who is learning already understands the nature of the language in question. If I hold up a pencil and say “This is tove”, it may mean either “this is pencil”, or “this is wood”, or “this is round”, or “this is to-be-used”, and so on. Wittgenstein writes, “Point to a piece of paper. – And now point to its shape – now to its colour – now to its number (that sounds queer). How did you do it?” (Philosophical Investigations 1958, § 33; cf. Blue and Brown Books, 1969², 2–4). Many years earlier Gottlob Frege underlined a further problem about the theory of reference. In practice, he argued, we sometimes use words which have different meanings to refer to the same object. Thus the meaning of “the morning star” is not the same as that of “the evening star”, even though both terms may refer to the planet Venus. This led Frege to distinguish between sense (Sinn) and reference. Frege’s objection is not fatal to referential theories, since they can be reformulated, as he saw, to take account of this difficulty. Nevertheless it does rob the theory of its common-sense appeal. Wittgenstein concluded that the referential theory of meaning can hold its spell over us only if we restrict our attention to certain kinds of words. He writes, “If you describe the learning of language in this way, you are, I believe, thinking primarily of nouns like ‘table’, ‘chair’, ‘bread’, and of people’s names, and only secondarily of the names of certain actions and properties; and of the remaining kinds of words as something that will take care of itself. . . . Think of exclamations alone, with their completely different functions . . .” (Philosophical Investigations §§ 1 and 27).

(ii) The second related principle which is often associated with the referential theory of meaning is also open to question, namely, that the word is the basic unit of meaning. In linguistics the chief criticism of this assumption comes from exponents of field semantics. Thus J. Trier insists that a word has meaning “only as part of a whole” and only “within a field” (Der Deutsche Wortschatz im Sinnbezirk des Verstandes, 1931, 6). The semantic scope of the word “red”, for example, cannot be assessed in merely abstract terms. Its scope will vary in accordance with whether it stands in contrast to “orange”, or only to “yellow”, within a field of colour-terms. Admittedly it is legitimate and indeed often necessary to study the meanings of words as such, provided that it is not forgotten that conclusions reached on this basis remain only generalizations arrived at on the assumption that the word in question occurs in a characteristic setting. Stephen Ullmann writes, “There is usually in each word a hard core of meaning which is relatively stable and can only be modified by the context within certain limits” (Semantics. An Introduction to the Science of Meaning, 1962, 49). A similar point is made by G. Stern (Meaning and Change of Meaning, 1931, 85). At the same time, however, it is very important to heed the warning of R. H. Robins, that this method of approaching meanings in terms of words is acceptable only “provided it is borne in mind that words have meanings by virtue of their employment in sentences . . . and that the meaning of a sentence is not to be thought of as a sort of summation of the meanings of its component words taken individually” (General Linguistics, 1964, 22). In this sense, words are more than mere names.

From a philosophical point of view, too, the equation of the word with the name has caused persistent problems from Plato to Russell and the earlier work of L. Wittgenstein. In his earlier writings Wittgenstein stated, “One name stands for one thing, another for another thing, and they are combined with one another. In this way the whole group – like a tableau vivant – presents a state of affairs” (Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus, 1961, 4, 0311). Wittgenstein came to see, however, that the notion of “simple” elements of language which correspond to “simple” objects is a mere abstraction demanded by the mind of the logician. He had earlier argued that simple objects stand in a determinate relation to one another, thereby constituting a state of affairs (Sachverhalt). Similarly, elements of language stand in a determinate relation to one another, in such a way that a statement constitutes a picture (Bild), or a model, of reality. On this view, every statement can in principle be wholly and completely analyzed with its smallest determinate elements, or “simples”. In his later writings, however, Wittgenstein powerfully and convincingly demonstrates that in practice language does not operate in this way. If we actually look at language, rather than try to force some theory on to it, he urges, we see that even terms like “simple” and “exact” have no self-evident meaning which can be arrived at prior to their actual settings in human life. All language is relative to its “surroundings”. The referential theory of meaning, therefore, of which Wittgenstein’s early picture theory formed one example, fails to do justice to the ways in which language is actually used, at least if it is offered as a comprehensive theory of meaning.

(b) The so-called ideational theory of meaning suffers from all of the difficulties of the referential theory. In the Graeco-Roman era the Stoics drew a threefold distinction between (1) “that which signifies” (to sēmainon), namely, the linguistic sign; (2) “that which is signified” by the sign (to sēmainomenon); and (3) the actual object or event in the physical world to which these correspond (to tynchanon). This is the origin of the famous “semantic triangle” which C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards still offer in the twentieth century as a basic model of the relation between language and meaning. According to these two writers, (1) there is a causal relation of reference between an object in the physical world and a concept, thought, or image in the mind (the first side of the triangle). (2) The concept or thought then stands in causal relation to its symbolic expression in language. Here the operative relation is that of symbolizing (the second side of the triangle). (3) Ogden and Richards claim that they have now explained the relation between the linguistic symbol and its object of reference. On the basis of the other two causal relations, we now have an imputed relation between the symbol and its referent (the third side of the triangle) (The Meaning of Meaning, 1923, 14). In effect, this is little more than an attempt to add a mentalist dimension to a theory of reference. In the seventeenth century John Locke argued that words are “external sensible signs . . . whereof invisible ideas might be made known to others. . . . The ideas they stand for are their proper and immediate signification” (An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 1798, III, § 21). In the twentieth century this emphasis has affinities not only with Ogden and Richards, but also with the work of Susanne K. Langer.

Rather than easing the difficulties of the referential theory, however, this approach makes matters even worse. As D. M. High urges, it is often associated with the idea that language is a rather shabby vehicle of expression for otherwise clear ideas. Linguistic expression derives its meaning from the image, idea, or mental picture, which the speaker is trying to communicate, “as if it were a kind of internal motion picture accompanying these performances” (Language, Persons, and Belief, 1967, 37). Once again, however, in his later writings L. Wittgenstein convincingly attacked the notion that language and thinking can be detached from each other in this way. Meaning is not a kind of mental process which somehow exists alongside actual speaking. In any case, in practice, we do not always experience a stream of images accompanying our speaking; nor is it easy to say in what a “thought” consists which we cannot express in language (cf. L. Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations §§ 338–42). We have already suggested that to think of language as that which merely articulates thoughts already present to the mind is an inadequate and perhaps misleading view of language (cf. also F. Waismann, Principles of Linguistic Philosophy, 1965, 153–93). Whatever may be said about images or concepts, however, the problem still remains that the ideational theory of meaning escapes none of the difficulties of theories of reference. J. Pelc argues that all theories of meaning are severely limited which simply try to extend what remains basically a theory of words as names. This theory can never progress beyond the assumption “that the meaning of a sentence is a function of the meaning of its components” (Studies in Functional Logical Semiotics of Natural Language, 1971, 58).

(c) The problem of meaning is best approached when language is viewed as part of a human activity, or of a form of life (L. Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations § 23). We begin neither with words, nor with ideas, nor even with propositions, but with the human being speaking language in a particular situation. Looking back on his earlier writings, Wittgenstein spoke of “turning our whole examination round” (§ 108). “Only in the stream of thought and life (Leben) do words have meaning” (Zettel, 1967, § 173). Both Martin Heidegger in Being and Time (though less in his later writings) and Wittgenstein in his later period stress that language is a particular activity on the part of a human subject. For Heidegger, language and understanding constitute an a priori existentials of Dasein, or human life. Meaning, Heidegger urges, is not something which we attach to some otherwise naked object which is present-at-hand (vorhanden). Meaning is bound up with the horizon of the human subject (Dasein) according to which he understands something as what it is to him (Being and Time, 1962, § 32). In a parallel way Wittgenstein urges: “every sign by itself seems dead. . . . In use it is alive” (Philosophical Investigations § 432). We must now ask: if thinkers from two of the three areas of thought outlined above adopt this approach, can the same be said of the third area, namely, general linguistics? It must be admitted that in linguistics, language is more readily abstracted from the human subject, and regarded as an “objective” scientific phenomenon in itself. But this is not the whole story. We have said that F. de Saussure stressed the social character of language. Indeed, he distinguished carefully between langue, the linguistic reservoir of the community, and parole, the actual concrete speech-acts. Thus in Saussure, hardly less than in Wittgenstein, we have the seeds of the modern perspective according to which the basic elements of language are neither words nor sentences as such, but, rather, “speech-acts” (F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, 9 and 13–14). Saussure’s contrast between langue and parole has been taken up and developed in recent linguistics in terms of the distinction between linguistic competence and linguistic performance (Noam Chomsky, Aspects of the Theory of Syntax, 1965, 5–15). Chomsky rejects the charge that his own “generative grammar” stresses competence at the expense of performance. Indeed he argues that in practice “the only studies of performance, outside of phonetics, are those carried out as a by-product of work in generative grammar” (15).

Wittgenstein’s approach to the problem of meaning finds expression in his use of the term “language-game”. He uses it in order to make two points. Firstly, language is grounded in human life. Wittgenstein writes, “The term ‘language-game’ is meant to bring into prominence the fact that the speaking of language is part of an activity, or of a form of life” (Philosophical Investigations § 23). Thus the term describes not only language itself but also “the actions into which it is woven” (§ 7). Secondly, language-uses are grounded in particular surroundings in human life. What language actually is, depends on the nature of the particular language-game under discussion. In a certain particular situation, language may indeed serve to “refer” to an object; and meaning may here be viewed in terms of reference. But language does not operate in a single uniform way. Certainly it does not always “describe”. We must make “a radical break with the idea that language always functions in one way . . . to convey thoughts” (§ 304). In more positive terms, “For a large class of cases – though not for all . . . the meaning of a word is its use (sein Gebrauch) in the language” (§ 43). Wittgenstein describes such uses of words or sentences as “countless”. This is because “this multiplicity is not something fixed, given once for all” (§ 23). In common with exponents of hermeneutical philosophy, he recognizes that language is open-ended towards future experience. New language-uses may emerge as human life develops. Wittgenstein writes, “Think of the tools in a tool-box: there is a hammer, pliers, a saw, a screw-driver. . . . The functions of words are as diverse as the functions of these objects. . . . What confuses us is the uniform appearance of words. . . . Their application (Verwendung) is not presented to us so clearly” (§ 11). It is, he suggests, like looking into the cabin of a locomotive. We see handles which look more or less alike (since they are all meant to be handled). But they all do different things, and may operate in different ways. To attempt to formulate some comprehensive theory of meaning is to imply that the relation between language and meaning is always the same. It is to be misled by the shape of the handles, or by the surface-grammar of language. By contrast, “we talk about it (language) as we do about the pieces in chess when we are stating the rules of the game, not describing their physical properties" (§ 108).

This approach does not lead to scepticism, however, concerning questions about meaning. On the contrary, it suggests only that such questions cannot be asked or answered in the abstract, independently of the task of looking at actual particular cases. We should even resist the temptation to ask: how does "religious language" acquire its meaning? We need to look at particular utterances in the actual life of the worshipping community, in order to determine what rôle these utterances play, and only then can we determine what may be said about their meaning. One of Wittgenstein's further insights was to see that concrete questions about meaning may also be answered with reference to observable life and conduct within the language-using community (\rightarrow 4 (c)). When we ask a question about meaning, "the kinds of use we feel to be 'the point' are connected with the rôle that such-and-such a use has in our whole life" (Remarks on the Foundations of Mathematics, 1956, I, § 16, 8). Wittgenstein himself offers many concrete illustrations of this principle, especially with reference to the meanings of such words or phrases as "think", "expect", "believe", "have pain", and "understand".

4. Language and Religion. (a) The language of religion is not necessarily a special kind of language, but is ordinary language put to a special kind of use. For example, when we talk about "hearing" the voice of God, we do not use a special word for "hearing"; but we do use the word "hearing" in a special way. Wittgenstein describes this kind of peculiarity as a difference of logical "grammar". He considers the statement: "You can't hear God speak to someone else; you can hear him only if you are being addressed"; and he observes: "That is a grammatical remark" (Zettel, § 717). In other words, this statement describes one of the logical peculiarities that marks the word "hear" when it applies, not to sound-waves striking the ear, but to hearing the voice of God. If someone finds it difficult to hear, he might be advised to buy a deaf-aid. But we should recommend a different course of action for someone who found it difficult to hear God. This indicates that "hear" has a peculiar grammar in this setting. Long before Wittgenstein, this feature of language was noted in the Fourth Gospel. Nicodemus is told, in effect, that "birth" into the kingdom of God has a different logical grammar from "birth" into the world (Jn. 3:3-7). The "living water" (i.e. running water) offered by Jesus to the woman of Samaria has a different grammatical status from that of "running water" as she imagines it (Jn. 4:10: "Sir, you have nothing to draw with . . ."). The disciples misunderstand the grammar of the "food" of which Jesus speaks (Jn. 4:31-34). The Jews misunderstand the peculiar meaning of "bread" (Jn. 6:31-35). In Wittgenstein's terms, Jn. shows that the problem of understanding the language of Jesus is bound up with the fact that its special "surroundings" have to do with faith and especially with christology. The claims which Jesus makes for himself give much of his otherwise ordinary language a distinctive meaning or grammar. Hence understanding his words and acknowledging his Person are bound up with each other.

(b) At the same time, the peculiarity of the logical grammar of Christian discourse should not be exaggerated. There are at least two bridges between "religious" language and that of the ordinary every-day world. The first of these is analogy. In analogy there is a parallelism, perhaps even an overlapping, between the ordinary every-day grammar of a word and its distinctive logical grammar in the setting of religion. When we say that Jesus is the "son" of God the "Father", an unwanted area of the every-day grammar of "father" and "son" must be cancelled off. We do not wish to imply that the son was born to the father at a particular moment in time, or that his existence is more recent than that of his Father. In this sense, the Arians were misled by failing to notice a feature of the logical grammar of "son" in this setting. On the other hand, the words "father" and "son" are used precisely because the relationship between God and Christ remains analogous to that of a human father and son. From an ontological rather than a linguistic point of view, Paul states that the fatherhood of God is a prototype of all human fatherhood (Eph. 3:15). Although he is not making a linguistic point here, Paul's statement nevertheless presupposes some degree of continuity between "father" as applied to God, and "father" as applied to men. In the same way, to take another example, God's "coming" cannot simply be equated with the use of the same word in ordinary settings, since God is believed already to be, in another sense, omnipresent. Yet when the biblical writers speak of God's "coming" to the earth, there is at least some area of overlap with the usual meaning of the word. Similarly, if God is omnipresent, in one sense man cannot be distant from him; but probably all Christians would acknowledge some element of analogy between "coming" back to God, and the "coming" back of the absent prodigal son to his human father.

The philosophical theologian Ian T. Ramsey has attempted to articulate this double phenomenon of similarity and difference by using the terms "model" and "qualifier" (Religious Language: An Empirical Placing of Theological Phrases, 1957, 49–89). Ramsey uses the word "model", where many theologians from Thomas Aquinas onwards would have used the term "analogy". On the basis of linguistic models, God is said to be the "cause" of the universe; to be "wise" and "good"; and to have brought forth "creation" according to his "purpose". But Christians wish to stress not only the continuity of these terms with their everyday meanings, but also their differences from them. Hence qualifiers are added alongside the models. God is not only "cause"; he is "first" cause. He is "infinitely" wise and good. Creation is "creation ex nihilo"; and is in accordance with his "eternal" purpose (61–79). One reason why Ramsey prefers the phrase "models and qualifiers" to the traditional term "analogy" is that he also wishes to argue that when language functions in this way it provides the basis for what he calls a disclosure situation. The logical oddity that results from coupling together a model and a qualifier is not merely, negatively, a sign that language is being stretched beyond its usual limits. More positively, it also provokes a situation in which, as the hearer seeks to understand the language, "light dawns", or "the penny drops". A disclosure occurs which operates at a level which is not purely cognitive and informative.

There are understandable reasons why Ramsey should be reluctant to make great use of the term analogy. Many mediaeval theologians based their doctrine of analogy on the belief that God must contain in a supremely eminent way (via eminentiae) the qualities or degrees of being manifested in every finite being. This via eminentiae was thought to represent the only alternative to speaking about God in purely negative terms (e.g. as incorporeal, impassible, invisible). Ramsey's approach does not necessarily presuppose these metaphysical assumptions about God and being. At the same time, however, it would be a mistake to draw too sharp a contrast between the traditional view of analogy and Ramsey's approach. Both approaches firmly assert two principles. Firstly, there is a necessary element of continuity or overlapping between religious uses of language and ordinary empirical applications of the same word or phrase. Secondly, there is also a necessary difference in the scope of their application, so that the precise scope of their meaning is different.

Two final points should be made about analogy. Firstly, analogy in this context is certainly not being used in a way which precludes metaphor. Metaphor is of the utmost importance in religious language. Indeed often to characterize certain specific language-uses in religion as metaphor is to lose sight of the fact that very much of our language is, in the widest sense, metaphorical. Not only the parables of the Synoptic Gospels and the imagery of Jn. and Rev., but also large stretches of theological argument in the Epistles necessarily use metaphor. But metaphor is not to be dismissed as somehow inferior to so-called literal discourse. To do this would be to yield to the spell of the referential and especially the ideational theories of meaning, and to assume that language must always be related to meaning in one uniform way. Secondly, when analogy is used, understanding is made more readily possible when a variety of models, images, or metaphors are used. This very variety helps the hearer to cancel off unwanted areas of the empirical, or every-day, meaning of the words or phrases in question. Thus in Jn., Jesus is indeed the shepherd; but he is also the light, the vine, the bread, the resurrection and so on. Unwanted areas of meaning are negated, whilst cross-bearings may be taken, as it were, which together point to the areas in which distinctive theological meanings converge.

(c) There is also a second major point of contact between the language of religion and the everyday empirical world. This comes to light in the modern philosophical debate about private language and public criteria of meaning. Wittgenstein, once again, is the thinker who has done most to set this debate in motion. Wittgenstein's starting-point is to consider the place of regularities, customs, and training, in the use of language. This aspect of language is also underlined in general linguistics, where Chomsky, Fodor, and Katz talk about mechanisms which are recursive (J. A. Fodor and J. J. Katz, The Structure of Language, 1964, 11; cf. 1–18 and 479–518). Wittgenstein is cautious about speaking of rules in any rigid or prescriptive sense. But he does speak of them in the sense of signposts or customs (Philosophical Investigations, §§ 198–9). He writes, "Obeying a rule is a practice. And to think one is obeying a rule is not to obey a rule. Hence it is not possible to obey a rule 'privately'" (§ 202). If the distinction between "correct" and "seems correct" disappears, then so has the concept "correct". It is easy to see what can count as a check or whether our use of the word "chair" or "table" is correct. If we were to use the word "chair" consistently in an incorrect way, someone else in the language-using community would soon tell us. But what kind of thing counts as a check on the correct use of words which relate to inner experiences or states of mind? Wittgenstein insists that if I know what it is to feel joy, grief, pain (and so on), only from my own case, I could not be aware of any regularity or custom about the application of these concepts in language. For what would it be to make a mistake in their application? In practice, however, such language is teachable, and not wholly "private" (in Wittgenstein's technical sense of the term). For we learn what joy, grief, pain, etc., is, because they play an observable part in life. Wittgenstein writes, "What would it be like if human beings showed no outward signs of pain (did not groan, grimace, etc.)? Then it would be impossible to teach a child the use of the word 'toothache'” (§ 257).

Although Wittgenstein's arguments about private language are made partly in the form of an attack on a Cartesian view of mind, we may apply this principle to the language of religion. If "being redeemed", "experiencing the Holy Spirit" (and so on), were purely (in Wittgenstein's sense of the term) "private" experiences, how could their meaning ever be conveyed to others? To be sure, there is a dimension to these experiences which is indeed inner and private. But it is also part of their very grammar that they should relate to human life in a public and observable way. In the same way we should say that pain is a genuinely "inner" sensation, but it is also necessarily compatible with some forms of overt behaviour and incompatible with others. What makes language teachable is its connexion with observable regularities in human behaviour. Hence what makes such a concept as "redemption" intelligible is not only (as we have seen) its analogy with parallel concepts in secular life, but also the cash-value of the concept in the observable life and ongoing tradition of the Hebrew – Christian community from the OT to the present day.

The OT in particular provides a publicly accessible tradition of patterns of events and behaviour which give currency to its language. The events of the Exodus, for example, provide a paradigm case, or a model language-game, of what "redemption" might mean. The notion of "salvation" begins to emerge as Israel passes through experiences of deliverance and prosperity in the period of the Judges. Piece by piece a tradition is built up, providing a continuity or regularity against which the application of certain concepts may be checked as correct or incorrect. These concepts do not of course remain static, but are purified and enriched as the biblical tradition grows. One reason why the biblical tradition is indispensable to Christian faith is that it provides paradigm cases of meaning, without which modern claims to "Christian" experience would face a problem of identity. The God who is worshipped in the Hebrew-Christian tradition is not merely the supreme being of speculative thought, but the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; and the God and Father of the Christ of the NT.

This principle contributes decisively, alongside analogy, to the solution of the problem of meaning in religion. It does not merely result, however, in a backward-looking biblicism. In the modern era, the secular man may begin to grasp the meaning of religious language as he is in a position to see its cash-value in terms of observable acts and attitudes on the part of the Christian community, or the religious man. Wittgenstein writes, "One learns the game by watching how others play" (Philosophical Investigations, § 54). Correspondence between word and deed in the Christian community provides a more radical and effective solution to the problem of meaning in religion than attempts to re-label the Christian vocabulary.

(d) There are other approaches to the problem of religious language which are perhaps best viewed as part of the history of twentieth-century philosophy. This applies especially to A. J. Ayer's principle of verification, which is hardly still a live issue today, except in philosophical traditions which are unduly dominated by empiricism. It will be useful to distinguish between three phases in the development of thought.

(i) Shortly after the turn of the century, G. E. Moore and Bertrand Russell voiced a strong protest against much of the language and outlook of philosophical idealism, as represented e.g. in the writings of F. H. Bradley. Moore claimed to write in the name of common-sense realism, and the mood of his thought was strongly empiricist. In addition to formulating his own approach, Russell claimed to find support for an empiricist orientation in the earlier work of Wittgenstein. We have already seen that, according to Wittgenstein's Tractatus, language serves to describe the facts of the physical world in a determinate way (or else express logical tautologies), but cannot be used for other purposes, including those of religion and ethics. That Wittgenstein himself did not wish his view to be understood as a defence of positivism can be seen from his correspondence with Paul Engelmann. (Recently this point has been brilliantly argued by A. Janik and S. Toulmin, Wittgenstein's Vienna, 1973.) Nevertheless, the Tractatus was interpreted by Russell and other in such a way that a thorough-going positivism was thought to be corroborated by Wittgenstein's early theory of language. Religious language, according to this approach, can result only in confusion, since it does not simply state facts about the world. This positivist outlook found particular expression in the Vienna Circle of the 1920s, of which one of the leaders was Rudolf Carnap.

(ii) A. J. Ayer's "Logical Positivism" represented the outlook of the Vienna Circle in Britain. Many believed that it took the discussion to a fresh stage. Ayer begins by attacking "the metaphysical thesis that philosophy affords us knowledge of a reality transcending the world of science and common sense" (Language, Truth, and Logic, 45). He then argued that any language which attempts to go beyond science or commerce is "devoid of literal significance". He asserts: "The criterion which we use to test the genuineness of apparent statements of fact is the criterion of verifiability" (48). We must ask, he urges, what observations must be made in order to check whether a statement is a factual one. Ayer's third step is to declare that if an utterance does not fall into this category, it is meaningless or "non-sense": "Until he (the speaker) makes us understand how the proposition that he wishes to express would be verified, he fails to communicate anything" (49). Ayer now adds two further points to his argument. Firstly, "analytic" statements (i.e. those which state what is true by definition) may be meaningful even though they remain unverifiable. Secondly, empirical statements need only be "verified in principle"; i.e. capable of verification, given the technical ability to make the observations required (whether or not these exist in practice).

In some quarters it was felt that Ayer had proved once and for all that religious utterances were without any genuine meaning. But other writers soon made the rejoinder that Ayer's approach remained fundamentally an empiricist viewpoint. H. J. Paton comments: "A purely linguistic approach may conceal from us what we are doing. . . . It is no new thing to find men who are prepared to believe only in what they can see and touch. . . . It is not easy to see why it becomes a more serious argument simply because it appears in a linguistic dress" (The Modern Predicament, 1955, 42). The decisive point that suggests special pleading on Ayer's part is that the verification principle itself is neither an analytical statement nor one that can be verified by observation. On the basis of Ayer's own work, it would be a meaningless criterion. Ayer slightly modified his original approach of 1936 in a second edition of Language, Truth, and Logic, in 1946, but the fundamental difficulties remain. In historical perspective we see how greatly Ayer was indebted to earlier empiricism and especially to the Tractatus as interpreted in the Russell tradition.

(iii) In the 1950s the debate about verification gave way to discussions about falsification. This principle can best be explained by an example. If the religious man asserts, "God is love", the philosopher may ask him what he would accept as evidence against the validity of this statement. If God allows millions to starve, or thousands to die of cancer, is this compatible with the statement that God is love? If the religious man answers that almost nothing would count against the validity of his assertion, the philosopher may reply that, in terms of meaning, it has died the death of a thousand qualifications. Very little, if any, of its actual content is left. One of the main exponents of this kind of approach is Antony Flew (New Essays in Philosophical Theology, 1955, 96–130). Philosophers of religion have reacted to it in two wholly different ways. Some argue that, like the principle of verification, this criterion of meaning applies only to empirical statements, and that it has nothing to do with religious language. They simply reject the challenge as irrelevant. Others accept the challenge, arguing that there must be and indeed are hypothetical situations which would falsify certain religious utterances. For example, if suffering never produced positive effects, or it could be shown that Jesus of Nazareth never lived, the status of certain religious utterances would be different. Those who accept the challenge of falsification see some value in this approach as helping to clarify the extent to which certain religious utterances include (though cannot be reduced to) cognitive or even empirical truth-claims. Nevertheless, the connexion between meaning and "making a difference" can perhaps be better explored in the broader context of questions about public criterion of meaning (→ above, (c)).

(e) Symbols, like metaphor, play an important rôle in religious language. Part of their power lies in the fact, that, according to Jung, symbols are vital for the necessary interplay between conscious and unconscious. Paul Tillich takes up Jung's approach, but in Tillich's theology the special place which he accords to symbol is bound up with a particular theological evaluation whereby the unconscious is thought to point to God. Tillich also tends towards a naturalistic view of language, arguing that, unlike the sign, the symbol itself "participates in that to which it points" (Theology of Culture, 1964, 54–5). These two assumptions may be questioned. But Tillich is correct in his emphasis on the power of symbols. He writes, "Every symbol is two-edged. It opens up reality, and it opens the soul" (op. cit. 57). "It opens up hidden depths of our own being" (Dynamics of Faith, 1957, 43). Symbols such as the sun, the closed door, inaccessible Eden, or the eschatological feast, reach right down into memories of childhood, or even perhaps through to racial memories. They call forth the response of the imagination and the heart. But pictures, as Wittgenstein reminds us, can be variously applied. This is the limitation of symbolic language. Whatever its relation to cognitive discourse in terms of its chronological use (cf. the parables of Jesus), from a logical point of view symbols can do no more than supplement cognitive discourse. To be sure, symbols (like parables and metaphor) are powerful in reaching through to the heart. But their application must be checked and tested against a broader linguistic content. For this reason, the Christian sacraments are always incomplete without the word. (I have discussed these points at greater length in Language, Liturgy, and Meaning, 1975, 22–32; and "The Theology of Paul Tillich", The Churchman 88, 1974, 86–107.)

5. Language and the Biblical Text. Certain theories of hermeneutics (→ Explain) and of translation-method are bound up with particular views about the nature of language. (a) There are three distinct aspects to R. Bultmann's hermeneutical programme. Firstly, Bultmann adopts the perspective found in Schleiermacher and Dilthey, according to which the interpreter's understanding of the text is partly conditioned by his own pre-understanding. Bultmann writes, "The exegete is not a tabula rasa, but on the contrary approaches the text with specific questions, or with a specific way of raising questions" (Existence and Faith, 1964, 342). Pre-understanding is "not a prejudice, but a way of raising questions" (346). These questions should not be suppressed, but they should also be open to correction as understanding of the text begins to dawn. From the point of view of a theory of language, this hermeneutical approach is based on the valid recognition that, in Wittgenstein's terms, neither the language of the text nor the concepts of the reader can be viewed outside a particular language-game (→ above, 3 (c)). Language is not an abstraction the content of which can be viewed independently of the standpoint of the text and the reader. Secondly, Bultmann also employs existential interpretation in his handling of many parts of the NT. This procedure is in itself neutral from the point of view of a theory of language, and its value must be judged on other grounds. Thirdly, however, in his programme of demythologizing Bultmann works with three particular conceptions of → myth, each of which has close connexions with a theory of language.

(i) Bultmann tends to confuse analogy (or metaphor) and myth, as linguistic categories. He defines myth as "the use of imagery [die Vorstellungsweise] to express the other worldly in terms of this world" (H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth, I, 1964, 10, n. 2). Thieliicke and Schniewind insist that if this is the case, myth is no more dispensable than analogy or metaphor, and demythologizing becomes impossible. (We cannot accept Bultmann's reply that what is really at issue is the uncritical use of such language, since it is by no means clear that it is used uncritically in the NT.) Further, Bultmann makes much of the argument that so-called contradictions in the NT are symptomatic of myth (e.g. that the death of Christ is sometimes viewed as a sacrifice, sometimes as a victory over evil powers). But this argument rests on the same confusion. What we have here is simply a necessary diversity in the use of analogies, models, or metaphors. We have already seen why diversity of this kind is necessary (→ above, 4 (b)).

(ii) We must also ask whether Bultmann's view of language presupposes too sharp a contrast between outer form and inner content, or between language and thought. According to his second definition of myth, mythology expresses the world-view of a pre-scientific age. Thus heaven is "above", and supernatural forces intervene in the course of events in the world. This view of myth stems from the outlook of the Enlightenment, and can be seen in Heyne, Eichhorn, and D. F. Strauss. The implication is that some inner content or message lies beneath the primitive linguistic form which hides it. The task of interpretation is, as it were, to extract the kernel from the husk. But if this really is Bultmann's view, it lies open to the kind of criticisms which are often brought against the ideational theory of meaning (→ above, 3 (b)). Exponents of the new hermeneutic are quick to make such criticisms on linguistic grounds (see E. Jünger, Paulus und Jesus, 1962, 135–9). There is perhaps some truth in this criticism, but we should be cautious about charging Bultmann with being concerned only about "inner" concepts. It could be argued that he is looking, in effect, for the "deep structure" which lies beneath the surface-grammar of the NT (→ (c) iii, iv).

Even so, there remains too disparaging an attitude towards the linguistic forms used by the NT. Bultmann's proposals may be compared to the interpretation of a code. Once it has been interpreted, the original code may be discarded as irrelevant. But the interpretation of the NT, as I. Henderson suggests, is more like the interpretation of a masterpiece. The interpreter returns to the original again and again. The original remains indispensable.

(iii) It is also arguable that Bultmann has misunderstood the logic of self-involving language, and failed to notice that language may perform different functions at the same time. In a third statement about myth he declares, "The real purpose of myth is not to present an objective picture of the world as it is [ein objektives Weltbild] but to express man's understanding of himself" (Kerygma and Myth, I 10; Ger. 23). Thus the statement that God will judge the world must be interpreted not as a statement about a future event at the end of history, but as a summons to live responsibly in the present. But Bultmann's valid recognition that this is not simply a flat descriptive statement about a future event does not carry with it the corollary that its statement-function should be ignored. Very often self-involving statements (as J. L. Austin showed) may depend on certain states of affairs being true. Because of his extreme, almost obsessive, antipathy towards "objectification" in religious language, Bultmann ignores the basic fact that a stretch of language may perform more than one function. Much more could be said about Bultmann's proposals, but our concern here is only with their relation to certain views of language.

(b) The outlook of the new hermeneutic has close affinities with the view of language found in Martin Heidegger's later writings. Heidegger believes that in modern Western society, with its orientation towards the technological and merely functional, language has ceased to be truly creative. Men have been beguiled into settling into a form of thinking that is mere calculation, and language has become trivialized. He traces the origin of the malaise of language to its roots in the dualism of Plato, when the unity of Being was fragmented into a division between the "lower" world of the physical senses and the "higher" realm of thought. This reduces both art and language into mere tools for the expression of concepts. But truly creative and eventful language, Heidegger urges, should communicate not "concepts" but reality. He writes, "Language is not a mere tool at his (man's) disposal. Rather it is that event which disposes of the supreme possibility of human existence" (Existence and Being, 1968³, 300). In accordance with the climate of modern technology, merely functional language, or "idle talk", fragments reality into self-contained "fields". By contrast, language which is grounded in Being "gathers all things up" (On the Way to Language, 1971, 108). A "world" is opened up, conveying a vision of reality which can be revealed to man not in the haste of his technological frenzy, but in quiet submissive composure (Gelassenheit), in silent meditative listening. Negatively, "Words and language are not mere wrappings in which things are packed for the commerce of those who write and speak. It is in words and language that things first come into being and are. For this reason the misuse of language in idle talk, in slogans and phrases, destroys our authentic relation to things" (An Introduction to Metaphysics, 1959, 13-14). Positively, "To know how to question means to know how to wait . . ." (206). We must "let language, from within language, speak to us" (On the Way to Language, 85). "Speaking is of itself a listening" (123).

E. Fuchs and G. Ebeling draw on this perspective in their approach to the NT.

Firstly, language does not merely convey concepts. The NT does not merely inform us about the love of Jesus, or about salvation; it conveys the reality of his love and salvation. Secondly, the language of the NT, especially the parables of Jesus, draws the hearer into a "world" in which he does not merely consider "ideas" as a detached observer; but feels the impact of the message deep down in his own nature. He is drawn over, as it were, to see reality with the eyes of Jesus. Thirdly, the language of Jesus is creative. It enlarges the horizons of the hearer, so that he is never the same man again. When language operates in this creative way, there occurs a language-event (Sprachereignis; Wortgeschehen). Tracing how the horizons of the hearer become one with those of Jesus, Fuchs makes much of the hermeneutical category of "common understanding" (Einverständnis). This is something prior to, and deeper than, conscious thought, and has close affinities with Gadamer's notion of "a common world". Thus man is not simply active subject, forcing language to express the concepts which he has already. Rather, he listens to language, so that "the truth has us ourselves as its object". "The text is not just a servant that transmits kerygmatic formulations, but rather a master that directs us into the language-context of our existence in which we exist 'before God'" (E. Fuchs, Studies of the Historical Jesus, 1964, 211).

The theory of language represented in Fuchs and Ebeling avoids some of the difficulties which we find in Bultmann. Fruitful use is made of certain aspects of Heidegger's thought and much can be learned from this approach. Nevertheless there is more than a hint of the view described above as that of word-magic (→ above, 1 (b), (c)). Moreover Fuchs is more successful in handling some parts of the NT (e.g. the parables) than others. I have discussed the value and the limitations of the new hermeneutic more fully elsewhere (A. C. Thiselton, "The New Hermeneutic" in I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977, 308–333).

(c) General linguistics has stimulated developments in biblical studies in at least four areas. (i) In 1961 James Barr drew on the insights of F. de Saussure and his successors in order to establish certain principles in the area of biblical exegesis and lexicography. In so doing, he exposed the weakness of many (though by no means all) of the contributions to TDNT. The three main principles which he takes up (all of which can be found in Saussure) are the priority of synchronic linguistics over diachrony; the structural nature of language; and the connexion between the structural approach and linguistic convention. Synchronic linguistics designates the study of language at a particular point in time; diachronic linguistics relates to its history, change, and development. Barr rightly attacks the tendency in many theological writings to arrive at conclusions about meaning on the basis of observations about word-history. We do not assume, for example, that the Eng. word "nice" basically means "ignorant", merely because it may be derived from the Lat. nescius, ignorant. Yet many biblical scholars attempt to describe the meaning of a term at a given point in time on the basis of an etymology perhaps long forgotten even by the biblical writer's own generation. Barr asserts, "The main point is that the etymology of a word is not a statement about its meaning but about its history" (The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961, 109).

Barr also draws on the axiom in general linguistics that the word alone, quite apart from its rôle within a field or a particular speech-act, carries with it a series of meanings which it draws from a variety of quite different contexts. For example, in certain contexts the NT word ekklēsia, church, may be used to mean “the body of Christ”, “the bride of Christ”, and so on. But it does not collect together all these meanings independently of how a particular context conditions its meaning. Thus it cannot be said to mean “bride of Christ” in Matthew’s chapters on the church. Barr describes this fallacious assumption as “the illegitimate totality transfer” and warns us that it “leads to the distortion of the semantic contribution made by words in contexts” (218 and 233). On the basis of the rôle of convention in language (→ above, 1 (b), (c)), Barr also attacks writers such as T. Boman for drawing conclusions about the nature of “Hebrew thought” from accidental linguistic morphology (→ above, 2). I have discussed the value of Barr’s approach more fully elsewhere (A. C. Thiselton, “Semantics and New Testament Interpretation”, in I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977, 75–104).

(ii) Some writers have explored the methods of field semantics for biblical interpretation. J. F. A. Sawyer, for example, takes as his point of his departure the linguistic axioms which we have noted in connexion with Saussure and Barr (Semantics in Biblical Research. New Methods of Defining Hebrew Words for Salvation, 1972). We noted earlier how the semantic scope of a colour-word may depend on the range of other colour-words within the “field” from which alternative colour-words might be selected. Sawyer examines the field of Heb. words which relate to salvation. This is necessarily an exercise in Hebrew lexicography, since the study shows how the scope of the Heb. terms reciprocally condition one another in a way which does not necessarily correspond with particular Eng. words. Whilst this remains, in one sense, a word-study, Sawyer does not assume that the word is an autonomous or independent bearer of meaning. He adopts the viewpoint of J. Trier that meaning is best explored in relation to the whole field (→ 3 (a)). (On the relation of Sawyer’s work to hermeneutics, → A. C. Thiselton, “The Semantics of Biblical Language as an Aspect of Hermeneutics”, in Faith and Thought, 103, 1976, 108–20.)

(iii) There is a growing body of literature on theories and methods of Bible translation. As representative of current trends, we cite the work of E. A. Nida and C. R. Taber (The Theory and Practice of Translation, 1969). The new focus of interest in Bible translation, they argue, is no longer that of reproducing the grammatical structure or style of the original language, but concerns the horizons and response of the receptor, or the modern native reader. “Correctness” is no longer regarded as an abstract absolute concept, but is always relative to the receptor’s needs and response. This approach presupposes a certain way of looking at language, and of the many observations which might be made about it, we select two.

First, a key distinction is made between the deep structure which underlies the stretch of language to be translated and the surface-grammar of both the source language and the receptor language. We may illustrate the point with reference to 1 Jn. 2:26 where the Gk. has “I have written this to you” (tauta egrapsa hymin). Traditionally the sentence “I have written this to you” would be said to represent the “correct” Eng. translation. But the NEB translates it “So much for (those who would mislead you)”. This is because it is recognized that the words in the Gk. constituted a signal that the writer was moving on to a fresh topic. Hence the “correct” translation would be that which conveyed the underlying function of the phrase to a modern English reader. One method often advocated in this connexion is the back-transformation of the Heb. and Gk. text into “kernels” which are then transformed again into a more appropriate surface-structure in the receptor language (see I. H. Marshall, ed., op. cit., 78, for “kernel”).

Secondly, if this approach is adopted, translation is (more than ever) inseparable from interpretation, or hermeneutics. It is a matter of building bridges between the source and receptor languages, in which the translator has to make theological and even cultural judgments, no less than the interpreter. No doubt this calls for added caution in assessing the extent to which such re-structuring is always legitimate. Nevertheless, as soon as we abandon a theory of meaning which is based on some artificially mechanical concept of word-meaning and reference, the problem is, as a matter of principle, inescapable. General rules will not take care of every case. Thus many translators would perhaps agree that in cultures where snow, for example, is unknown, “very white” might be a “correct” translation of “white as snow”. But probably few would follow J. B. Phillips in regarding “ill from some psychological disease” as a correct translation of “possessed by an evil spirit” (Lk. 13:11). Problems such as this cannot be solved by purely mechanical means and the reason for this lies in the nature of language.

(iv) The most recent application of linguistics to biblical studies occurs in the work of Erhardt Güttgemanns and his school. Güttgemanns stands on the borders between linguistics, structuralism, and hermeneutics. As in the case of the translation theory discussed above (→ above, iii) the principle of “transformation” is crucial to his programme. He accepts the basic axioms of linguistics from Saussure to Chomsky concerning such issues as the priority of synchrony over diachrony (→ above, i); the contrast between linguistic competence (or virtuality, Virtualität) and performance (or actuality, Positivität); and the fact that meaning of a text is not the mere aggregation of its elements. But the binary or “game-tree” principle, according to which (in linguistics) meaning is seen in terms of a choice between alternatives, is also related to the binary or game-tree principle in anthropological structuralism. Narratives and parables, for example, are said to embody a deep structure which lies under the surface of the text. The task of “generative poetics” (as Güttgemanns calls his approach) is to arrive at a theory of actions or rôles within the “generative” matrix (competence) that finds expression on the surface of the narrative or parable (performance). Güttgemanns’ approach is highly complex, and cannot be described clearly within a short space. He himself claims to offer a radical alternative to traditional exegesis which takes adequate account of the nature of language for the first time. As yet, it is too soon to tell whether he can fully justify his enormous claims.

6. Responsibility in the Use of Language. (a) The biblical writers speak equally of the power of language and of the need for caution, even reticence, in its use. (i) “Death and life are in the power of the tongue” (Prov. 18:21). “The tongue of the wise brings healing” (12:18), and a good word may bring gladness (v. 25). Words may be edifying (10:21) and may bring forth solid and productive results (12:14). “A gentle tongue is a tree of life” (15:4). In the NT the speaking of words is bound up with the experience of salvation. Salvation entails verbal confession (Rom. 10:9); and men cannot believe in him “of whom they have never heard” (10:14) (→ above, 1 (a)). (ii) At the same time, men will be called to account for their idle words (Matt. 12:36). Cruel or clumsy words can be like the piercing of a sword (Prov. 12:18).

Flattery may ruinously inflate a man's self-esteem (29:5); and the speech of a wicked man spreads strife (16:27, 28). Hasty and thoughtless words are counter-productive: "The mind of the righteous ponders how to answer; but the mouth of the wicked pours out evil things" (15:28). Christians are urged to be slow to speak (Jas. 1:19). For the tongue can be like a fire that sets a whole forest ablaze, and can spread deadly poison (Jas. 3:5, 6, 8).

(b) Martin Heidegger (→ above, 5 (b)) reminds us that we receive language as a trust, which is not to be taken for granted and treated lightly. In our own day, speech is often trivialized and relativized. In mass advertizing and in the realm of social engineering we can be seduced by words which masquerade as descriptions, but which in practice express only value-judgments. One man may speak of a "problem drinker", where others may use the term "drunkard". One political commentator calls a man "unco-operative", where another expresses admiration that he "stands by his principles". If language is manipulated irresponsibly for questionable purposes, its currency wears thin, and it ceases to be able to bear the freight which we put upon it.

(c) A still more fundamental issue, however, is raised by Wittgenstein's observations about public criteria of meaning (→ above, 4 (c)). We have seen that the publicly observable attitudes and conduct of the Christian community form the necessary backing that gives currency to its language. "One learns the game by watching how others play". "Only in the stream of thought and life do words have meaning". The warning against "idle words" (Matt. 12:36) refers not to the uttering of social pleasantries (which indeed have social value) but to words that are ineffective because they have no backing in practical conduct. Empty promises, vain intentions, or smooth blandishments fall into this category. Words that merely chase other words give rise to a circularity and a relativism that have no anchorage in reality. To cite one of Kierkegaard's similes, it is as if a shop sign which promises "Trousers Pressed Here" turns out, after all, to be displayed not by a cleaner's, but only by a shop which sells shop signs. Or to cite a simile from Wittgenstein, it is as if a man says, "I know how tall I am", and puts his hand on top of his head to prove it. Even the praises of the Christian community must be grounded in attitudes and acts which give them valid linguistic currency. By contrast with our frequent human failures, Jesus Christ fully embodied and lived out "the word made flesh". Jesus did not simply talk about humility; he took a towel and washed the disciples' feet. He did not only talk about sacrifice; he was actually crucified. He did not merely speak words about forgiveness and new life; he actually gave men forgiveness and new life. The language of Jesus is both intelligible and effective because it is grounded in life and in practical action. The Christian community is called to accept that same responsibility for the language which it speaks (→ Truth).

CL 1. (a) The vb. ergazomai, which is a cognate of the noun ergon, has in the intrans. the basic meaning to work, to be engaged on something. Used trans. (linked, for instance, with ergon), it means to create, to produce, to perform and also to process (e.g. a raw material).

(b) ergon denotes from Mycenaean Gk. onwards a deed, an action, by contrast either with inactivity or a mere word. It can refer to a specific occupational or official activity (e.g. agriculture or the military profession), and means in certain cases achievement, work; it is finally encountered with the weakened meaning of thing, matter. In the plur. ergon can also mean history.

(c) ergasia has a similar, if rather more limited, meaning; it can mean labour, occupation, arrangement, work (especially cultural) or business.

(d) The noun ergatēs generally indicates someone who does something, or else it means a worker as the member of a class (frequently a slave) or of an occupational group (in particular farm-labourers).

Whereas the vb. ergazomai and the noun ergon with the above basic meanings can be found from Mycenaean times, Homer and Hesiod in cl. Gk., ergasia is first found in Pindar, and ergatēs only in the 5th cent. B.C. (the tragedians and Hdt.).

(e) energeia is found in the Pre-Socratics to denote activity. It is translated by activity, effectiveness, force. energeō accordingly means intrans. to be active, to be at work; trans. to effect or to do something. energēs is a later allied form (Aristotle onwards) of the adj. energōs, active, effective. energēma is that which is effected, a deed.

While the word-group frequently serves in Hellenism and in Philo to describe cosmic and physical forces, energeia in the LXX (as in the NT) is used “almost exclusively for the work of divine or demonic powers” (G. Bertram, TDNT II 652). The word occurs only in 2 Macc. 3:29; 3 Macc. 4:21; 5:12, 28; Wis. 7:17, 26; 13:4; 18:22. energeō occurs only at Num. 8:24; 1 Esd. 2:20; Prov. 21:6; 31:12; Wis. 15:11; 16:17; Isa. 41:4.

(f) Also belonging to the main word-group under consideration are the words euergesia, good deed, well-doing, the vb. euergeteō, to do good, and the noun euergētēs. euergesia is already found in Homer; the vb. euergeteō is found in the tragedians, and euergētēs from Pindar onwards. euergētēs acquired in the world of Hellenism and Roman culture the significance of an honorary title which is given to deserving men, especially kings.

(g) synergos (Pindar onwards) denotes a colleague, a fellow-worker, an assistant.

From this the vb. synergeō is formed (Eur. onwards) meaning to work together, cooperate, aid, to further.

2. Already in Hesiod, work is described as having moral value; “through labour [ex ergōn] men become rich in herds and well-to-do. Those who work are much preferred by the immortal gods. Labour is by no means a disgrace, but laziness is a disgrace” (Works 307 ff.). Man shows himself fit by his ergon. One can understand from this how in Xenophon an expression speaks of gignōskein, recognizing a man ek tōn ergōn, by or in his works. In Plato (Politicus 352d–353e) ergon appears closely related to → virtue (aretē). This connexion is systematically unfolded in Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics: it is the task of aretē to bring to perfection the ergon (e.g.) of an organ (such as the seeing of an eye). The ethical value of particular deeds or accomplishments, erga, is frequently expressed by predicates such as kala, lovely, agatha, good, or negative ones like kaka, bad, adika, unjust, ponēra, evil.

OT In the LXX the word group is employed with the whole range of meaning of the cl. Gk. usages, serving with especial frequency to translate the Heb. words ‘āsāh, to do, to make, pā’al, to make, to do, and ‘ābād, to work, to serve. Synonyms for ergon are provided by the word groups associated with → poieō and (more rarely) → prassō. What is new over against cl. Gk. is conditioned by Israel’s particular faith in God.

1. ergon is thus used right at the beginning of the LXX to describe the work of the divine Creator (Gen. 2:2 f.). In the case of God’s deed which takes place by means of a word (cf. 2 Esd. 4[6]:38, 43), the above-mentioned impression of an opposition between word and work can naturally not arise. In this connexion, although the phrase (erga cheirōn sou, “the works of thy hands”) is frequently found to denote the work of the Creator, which embraces heaven, earth and men, the sing. ergon is found more often (e.g. Pss. 8:4, 7; 90[89]:16; 138[137]:8; Job 14:15; Isa. 29:23; cf. Heb. 1:10; 3:4). In the same way, ergon stands for God’s works over and above the creation, and it then principally means the acts of Yahweh in history, through which he demonstrates to Israel his covenant-faithfulness (cf. e.g. the quotation from Ps. 95[94]:9 in Heb. 3:9). Hence, the term ergon now and then comes to mean miracle (e.g. Deut. 11:3; Sir. 48:14). God’s deed, however, means not only preservation and salvation, but also judgment (e.g. Isa. 28:21; cf. Acts 13:41).

2. When ergon relates to the doings of human beings, it is able, within the compass of the LXX, to give expression especially to three major theological ideas.

(a) In most places where the word-group occurs, it has a positive meaning, namely, when it is used for the purpose of describing man’s accomplishment of a task laid on him by God (cf. Gen. 2:15). Cultic actions, such as temple service and the offering of → sacrifices, appear as deeds of religious worth (cf. Num. 8:11). But also in everyday life that work is judged positively which demonstrates itself to be obedient fulfilment of the divine will, of the → law (cf. Exod. 20:9 f. and Deut. 5:13 f., where in the context of the Decalogue a significant alternation of work and rest is ordained). This applies as much to one’s ordinary sphere of work (cf. Deut. 2:7; 14:29; Job 1:10; Ps. 90[89]:17) as to particular acts of obedience (e.g. Neh. 13:14, a work of love; Ps. 15:2, righteousness; Zeph. 2:3; cf. Pss. 7:4 f.; 18:21 ff.).

(b) In conjunction with the story of the Fall, ergon characterizes work as trouble, a burden and a curse (cf. Gen. 3:17 ff.; 4:12; 5:29; Deut. 26:6). This idea is particularly alive in Hellenistic Judaism where man's works are seen as essentially sinful (1 Esd. 4:37; 2 Esd. 7:119; Syr. Bar. 48:38; 54:2; TDNT II 644 f.).

(c) In other places in the LXX, the word ergon – perhaps influenced by Hellenistic Judaism – has the meaning of a bad, reprehensible deed which brings separation from God, i.e. of → sin (cf. e.g. Job 11:11; 21:16; 24:14). It is not so much here a matter of a particular wicked act but the sinful nature of actions which are alienated from God (cf. e.g. Prov. 11:18). God sees through the works of such people who, when it is dark (Isa. 29:15), are actively godless or lawless; “He shatters the mighty without investigation” (Job 34:25), for “their works are works of iniquity” (Isa. 59:6). The resultant negative assessment of human action “takes on a radically theological character in the NT” (TDNT II 645).

3. In Judaism, in particular, the view of works necessary for the fulfilment of the law and therefore for → righteousness (dikaiosynē) is developed and consolidated. The way to godliness is casuistically prescribed for the Jew by a multiplicity of regulations for the performance of the → law. There were, for example, the → Sabbath laws or the prescriptions for ritual cleansing with which Jesus and his disciples came into conflict. But since not everyone followed this path in all its details, a distinction was made between the righteous man and the average devout person (notably in Syr. Bar. and 2 Esd.). Eschatological intensification is given to this distinction (but cf. already Isa. 3:10 f.) by the notion of → reward and punishment related to the divine → judgment. One day God will recompense men according to their deeds. The godless will then receive their punishment, whereas the righteous can die without fear, for in God's sight they have “a store of works preserved in treasuries” (Syr. Bar. 14:12; cf. Matt. 6:20; Lk. 12:33; 1 Tim. 6:19). There are also isolated utterances, which anticipate the teaching of Lk. 17:10, such as Aboth 1:3: “Be not like slaves that minister to the master for the sake of receiving a bounty, but like slaves that minister to the master not for the sake of receiving a bounty; and let the fear of Heaven be upon you.” But even these are not capable of erasing the impression of a firmly-stamped theology of works-righteousness.

At the same time, Judaism was also aware of God's acts. Praise of the works of the Creator had particular significance, but God's saving acts in history and in the last days were also praised (e.g. in the hymns of Qumran).

NT ergazomai, to labour, be active, bring about, work, occurs in the NT 41 times (18 in Paul), ergon, work, 169 times (Paul 68 times, including the Pastorals 20; Jn. 27; Rev. 29; Jas. 15; Matt. 6; Mk. and Lk. twice each; Heb. 9; Acts 10; 1 and 2 Pet. twice each; the Johannine letters 5; and Jude once), ergasia, business, 6 times (4 in Acts and once each in Lk. and Eph.), and ergatēs, workman, 16 times (Synoptics 10 times; 4 times in Acts; and once each in Jn. and Jas.). The basic meanings of the word-group in the NT correspond to those mentioned above in CL 1. Rev. 18:7 is noteworthy: to work the sea means to navigate. ergon stands alongside both logos (→ word; e.g. in Lk. 24:19; Acts 7:22; 2 Thess. 2:17; 2 Cor. 10:11), and also boulē (plan, intention; Acts 5:38). As a designation of the actions of the believer, ergon can be used synonymously with karpos, → fruit. The expressions ergon or ergazesthai, to work a work (e.g. Matt. 26:10 par. Mk. 14:6; Jn. 3:21; 6:28; 9:4; Acts 13:41; 1 Cor. 16:10) are common. As synonyms, there are ergon and the plur. erga poiein, to do a work (Matt. 23:3, 5; Jn. 5:36; 7:21; 8:31; 10:37; 14:10, 12; 15:24; 2 Tim. 4:5; 3 Jn.

10; Rev. 2:5; cf. Jas. 1:25, poiētēs), and in one place erga prassein (Acts 26:20).

1. (a) In the Synoptic Gospels theological usage of the word-group can be detected. ergazesthai denotes activity in a quite general sense (cf. Lk. 13:14; Matt. 21:28, in the vineyard), the performing of some work (e.g. Matt. 26:10 par. Mk. 14:6, the anointing at Bethany). There is a distinct nuance in the meaning of ergasia in Lk. 12:58, where it is best translated by “make an effort” (RSV, NEB). The relatively commonly used ergatēs denotes (in accordance with its natural sense) someone who works for wages (Matt. 20:1, 2, 8), then a witness standing in Christ’s service and sent into the world (Matt. 9:37 f. par. Lk. 10:2), but also an evil-doer, ergatēs adikias, who will not stand in the judgment (Lk. 13:27; cf. Matt. 7:23). Whereas the Pharisees are censured by Jesus for doing their works “in order to be seen by men” (Matt. 23:5), the deed of the woman who anointed him is called an ergon kalon, a lovely act, Matt. 26:10 par. Mk. 14:6; and the disciples are enjoined, “Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 5:16; cf. 1 Pet. 2:12). The Synoptics certainly stress that man has no legal claims before God to any particular remuneration for his deeds (cf. Lk. 17:10; Matt. 20:1–16); but they put the challenging question as to the fruits of faith quite clearly. W. Joest goes so far as to say: “Synoptic paraenesis frees the work of the disciple from the securitas of the pride of merit, but not from the fear of winning or losing salvation” (Gesetz und Freiheit, 1961³, 160).

ergon is related to the work of Christ in Matt. 11:2 and Lk. 24:19, where it embraces his effective working in deed and word.

(b) In John’s Gospel the word group is specifically used to illustrate the unique activity of Jesus, which is inextricably bound up with the working of God, the Father, as (e.g.) Jn. 5:17 bears witness: “My Father is working still, and I am working too” (cf. Jn. 4:34; 17:4). Jesus understands his working as the fulfilment of his divinely-appointed mission (cf. Jn. 9:4; 5:36; 10:25), which aims to awake faith in the One who has been sent as the Revealer of God (cf. Jn. 6:29). Jesus’ miracles also serve this end (→ Miracle, art. sēmeion; Jn. 14:11; cf. 10:25). In the revelatory work of Jesus, which is also “the work of the Judge” (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 246), the spirits divide (cf. Jn. 3:19–21; 15:24); the unbeliever now no longer has any excuse for his sin (Jn. 15:22 ff.). The believer, on the other hand, is given the promise that he will do even greater works than Jesus (Jn. 14:12). Works done “in God” (en theō; Jn. 3:21) contrast with erga ponēra, evil works (Jn. 3:19; 7:7; cf. 1 Jn. 3:12), which are committed in alliance with the devil (Jn. 8:41, 44; cf. 1 Jn. 3:8). In Jn., therefore, the concept of working gains its specific theological structure from its christological grounding, from its point of departure in Jesus’ work as Revealer.

(c) Paul, by contrast, takes up more the contemporary Jewish understanding of work as an accomplishment required of men, in order to stress, by way of a blunt antithesis, that there is no → righteousness in God’s sight on the basis of human achievement. There is only righteousness on the basis of the reception of grace. The way of salvation is not prescribed through the → law, but only through Jesus Christ, who is “the end of the law that every one who has faith may be justified” (Rom. 10:4). The works of the law, which play such a large rôle in Judaism, are rigorously rejected by Paul, because in his eyes they are a human substitute for the true → obedience of faith (O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1955¹⁰, 87), the hypakoē pisteōs (cf. Rom. 1:5; 16:26). “Becoming righteous . . . does not come about from fulfilling the commandments; it is fulfilled in Christ by means of faith in him” (H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Galater, KEK 7, 1962¹², 57). Paul is concerned with understanding the true significance of faith of which → Abraham is adduced as an exemplar (Rom. 4:1–25; Gal. 3:6–18). This insight into the soteriological incompatibility of a work of the law (ergon nomou) and → grace (charis) or → faith (pistis) forms the centre of Pauline theology (cf. Rom. 3:20, 27 f.; 4:6; 9:12, 32; 11:6; Gal. 2:16; 3:2, 10).

On the one hand, then, works are condemned as a way of salvation; yet on the other hand, there are passages where works receive a positive significance even in Paul. As Paul knows of a law of Christ besides the law which condemns (cf. 1 Cor. 9:21; Gal. 6:2), so he speaks of positive erga besides the works of darkness (erga tou skotous, Rom. 13:12) or the works of the flesh (erga tēs sarkos, Gal. 5:19). Missionary work, for instance, appears as a work of the Lord (ergon kyriou, 1 Cor. 16:10; 15:58; cf. Phil. 2:30), which Christ works through the apostles (cf. Phil. 1:6). Indeed, Paul can put to the Corinthians the rhetorical question, “Are you not my workmanship [ergon] in the Lord?” (1 Cor. 9:1). In the sphere of ethics, Paul upholds the validity for Christians of the imperative to do good to everyone (Gal. 6:10; cf. Rom. 2:10; 2 Thess. 2:17). There is also the notion of good works in Paul in the context of the final → judgment. On the day of “wrath when God’s righteous judgment will be revealed” God will “render to every man according to his works” (Rom. 2:5 f.) without any regard for persons; and not only will the works of the heathen be judged, but those of Christians too (1 Cor. 3:11 f.; cf. Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; 1 Pet. 1:7; Rev. 2:23). “It is obvious that Paul knows and states that the work of Christians, by which they will be judged in the last judgment, does not provide any human ground for kauchēma. But now he says precisely of this work (understood, as always, as the deed of the ‘unprofitable servant’) that God judges, rewards and punishes on the basis of it” (W. Joest, op. cit., 175).

(d) The vibrant dialectic, distinguished in Paul by his rejection of all works-righteousness and by his simultaneous knowledge of the impossibility of an unproductive faith, appears in a somewhat different light in the Pastoral Epistles. Here it is one pole that is powerfully accentuated – that of the aspect of good works (1 Tim. 5:10, 25; 6:18; Tit. 1:16; 2:7, 14; 3:8, 14; cf. 1 Pet. 2:12).

(e) If Paul stresses faith as the decisive factor, in James it is the emphatic demand for works, extolled in the law of liberty (nomos tēs eleutherias, Jas. 1:25), which comes to the fore. Without works faith is dead (Jas. 2:17); it is only through works that it is perfected (Jas. 2:22, 24). The spirited advocacy of this interpretation by James must be understood from his own situation. While Paul primarily fought against the Judaic and Judaistic misunderstanding that human works lead to righteousness, James turns against the “practical aberration of a dead orthodoxy which rests on mere confession” (F. Hauck, Die Briefe des Jakobus, Petrus, Judas und Johannes, NTD 10, 1937, 20). In his own way he thus helps to describe the field of tension in which God’s saving activity seeks to awaken men to faith, to whose structural elements belong obedience (hypakoē), → hope (elpis) and → love (agapē),

2. (a) energeia, working, operation, action, is found in the NT 8 times (only in the Pauline corpus), energeō, to be active, 21 times (18 in Paul, twice in Matt., once in Jas.), energēma, deed, twice, in 1 Cor. and energēs, effective, 3 times (twice in Paul, once in Heb.). The word-group refers, as a rule, to the working of God (e.g. 1 Cor.

12:6; Eph. 1:11) or of his antagonist, → Satan (2 Thess. 2:9; cf. Rom. 7:5; Eph. 2:2), who is also ultimately subject to God (2 Thess. 2:11), as is → death, which also appears as an active power (2 Cor. 4:12). Particular prominence is given to the efficacious power of God by which he raised Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:20; Col. 2:12). This divine power is effective both in Christ (Phil. 3:21; cf. Matt. 14:2) and in the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 12:11, where the Holy Spirit appears as the uniform effective cause of the gifts of grace). By it the → apostles are equipped for their office (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:29), just as by it the word becomes the authoritative judge of the thoughts and intentions of the heart (Heb. 4:12). The members of the body of Christ also come to share in it (Eph. 4:16; cf. 1 Cor. 12:10). God, the One who is at work (energōn), creates both the will (thelein) and the deed (energein, Phil. 2:13), which take shape in the love of the believers (cf. Gal. 5:6).

(b) euergetēs, in its sole occurrence in the NT (Lk. 22:25), has the sense of an honorary title (see above, CL 1 (f)), which is then, characteristically, repudiated. Jesus' disciples are not to allow themselves to be called "Benefactors", as are the rulers of the world (cf. the rejection of the titles Rabbi, Master, Father and Teacher in Matt. 23:7–12); they are called to → serve (Lk. 22:26; cf. Matt. 23:11).

The vb. euergetein, to do good (only in Acts 10:38) refers to the good deeds of Jesus to which his apostles testify. euergesia in Acts 4:9 denotes the healing of a sick man by the apostles; in 1 Tim. 6:2 the same word characterizes that attitude of a Christian master to his slaves which is in keeping with the gospel.

(c) In the NT the vb. synergeō, work together, is found 5 times, synergos, a colleague, 12 times (including 11 in Paul). In Rom. 8:28 Paul seizes on a maxim which is embedded into late Jewish tradition (O. Michel, op. cit., 179–83; cf. Test. Iss. 3:8; Test. Gad 4:7; Test. Ben. 4:5; Ber. 60b, "Let a man always accustom himself to say: All that the Almighty does, he does for good"; Taanith 21a, "That too is for good"). He states "that for those who love God, all things work together for good" (cf. AV), i.e., that for them everything is beneficial, even "the suffering and rejections, the enigmas of faith" (O. Michel, op. cit., 181). Jas. 2:22 speaks of the necessary integration of faith and works (→ Righteousness).

Otherwise, the word-group refers to the missionary situation. Mk. 16:20 belongs to the longer ending of Mk. (cf. W. R. Farmer, The Last Twelve Verses of Mark, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 25, 1974). It reports that the Lord worked with the disciples confirming their word by the accompanying signs. It is true that this ratificatory accompanying work of God is the decisive element in all missionary activity; but it is a real co-working, in as much as the person who has been called by God to be a witness is himself no mere inactive instrument in the proclaiming event, but equally a co-operating servant of God. Paul can therefore formulate it thus: theou gar esmen synergoi, "we are God's fellow-workers" (1 Cor. 3:9 RSV mg.; cf. 2 Cor. 6:1). The content of the apostolic co-operation is more exactly outlined in 1 Thess. 3:2 ("in the gospel of Christ"); Col. 4:11 ("for the kingdom of God"), 3 Jn. 8 ("for the truth") and 2 Cor. 1:24 ("for your joy").

ποιέω

ποιέω (poiēō), do, make; ποιήσις (poiēsis), doing, working, deed; ποίημα (poiēma), what is made, work, creation;

ποιητής (poiētēs), one who does something, maker, doer; ἀγαθοποιία (agathopoiia), well-doing, doing good; ἀγαθοποιός (agathopoiios), doing good, upright, one who does good.

CL 1. The verb poieō, attested since Homer, and generally to be trans. to do, to make, has passed through a varied development. It is the basic term for all activity. The subjects belonging to the vb. include both divinities and human beings; more rarely they are material subjects (e.g. the soil or a tree produces).

(a) In so far as Gk. literature reports the doings of the gods, e.g. in Hesiod's theogony (Works 109 ff.) or later in Plato's Timaeus (29e ff.), the word takes on the meaning of to create, generate, give shape to.

(b) Human doing and making can refer to any kind of activity. Used intrans., poieō has the meaning of to act; positive or negative valuation is given from an ethical point of view. Platonic texts therefore also use the verb in the sense of making every effort (pan poiein, e.g. Phaedo 114c).

2. The noun poiēsis (used from Hdt. onwards) accordingly means both directed action and the manufacture of objects (e.g. Plato, Soph. 266d). poiēma (Hdt. onwards) denotes the finished work, the product (e.g. Plato, Chrm. 163c). It is executed by a poiētēs, a doer, an author (Aristophanes, Ranae 96, 1030), who can also be a poet.

OT 1. Semitic linguistic usage knows of only a few abstract word-formations. The LXX therefore has many sentence parts which – analogously to Eng. colloquial speech – formulate their thought with the help of poieō, which occurs over 3,200 times. The determinative noun is added to the verb: to do the commandment and the law (Jos. 22:5), to do work (Exod. 20:9 f.), to do good or evil (Ps. 34[33]:15; Ecc. 8:11 f.; Jer. 2:13), to make peace (Isa. 27:5), to make one's way (Jdg. 17:8), to construct a "hand-made" god (Isa. 44:9; 46:6). Naturally, poieō is also used absolutely (e.g. Exod. 30:25).

2. The Hebrew equivalent for to do and to make is chiefly 'āsāh. So far as God's creative deeds are concerned, the Priestly account of creation (Gen. 1:1–2:4a) has in addition the word bārā', which is reserved in the OT for the work of Yahweh. The LXX trans. bārā' in Gen. and Isa. 41–45 by poieō. Even the antithetical bārā' and 'āsāh in Gen. 6:7 are rendered both times by poieō, whereas the later Gk. text of Aquila differentiates the two. 2 Macc. 7:8 stresses that God has "made everything [epoiēsen] out of nothing".

But Yahweh does not only act as Creator: he works also in history, and in particular directs the fortunes of his people Israel. Again, a noun describes the particularity of the respective work: Yahweh does wonders (Exod. 15:11; Jos. 3:5; Ps. 72[71]:18), makes the days (Ps. 118[117]:24), does great things (Job 5:9), "performs" his word ("to see it fulfilled", Jer. 1:12 JB).

3. The use of poieō for human dealings branches out in many directions. The LXX trans. again mainly goes back to 'āsāh. The following scheme emerges if we attempt to distinguish formal divisions (cf. H. Braun, TDNT VI 467 ff.); everyday dealings not determined by commandment (Gen. 21:8; 1 Sam. 2:19), directions and prohibitions in the secular sphere which are given by commandment (Gen. 30:31; Exod. 35:33), dealings with one's neighbour as instructed by the law (Jos. 2:12; 2

Sam. 2:6) actions related to the will of God and the law which are expressly commanded (Ps. 40[39]:9; Isa. 44:28). In the latter case, the OT often adds a “whole” or “all” to the object in the text (e.g. Deut. 29:28 [EVV 29]). In this way the pious Jew recognized in his deed the required seriousness of his moral or cultic action.

4. In rabbinic Judaism, the terms which are translated by poiēō in the LXX, are used of God’s works in creation (e.g. Ber. 9:2; Aboth 4:22). With men as the subject, behaviour in accordance with the Torah involves the whole range of questions concerning obligation to Yahweh. Pious action is seen in terms of casuistical regulations for the whole range of life (e.g. Aboth 1:9).

NT The vb. poiēō occurs 565 times in the NT, primarily in the Gospels. poiēma, however, is found only twice, poiēsis only in Jas. 1:25, poiētēs 6 times, of which 3 are in Jas. 1:22–25. In view of the overwhelming use of the vb., it is advisable to forgo many nuances of meaning and simply to give a systematic presentation of its essential content. The nouns are similar in both form and meaning.

1. (a) The NT reaffirms the OT statements of God as Creator (e.g. Mk. 10:6; Acts 4:24; Rev. 14:7). poiēma, occurring only in Rom. 1:20 and Eph. 2:10, means the works of God’s creation and new creation. The same applies to the (otherwise not used) pass. form of the vb. in Heb. 12:27.

(b) Further, the statements concerning God’s activity of bringing salvation in history belong here. They are modelled grammatically on the syntax of the LXX, in that poiēō is linked with an accompanying object. The NT writers speak confidently of God’s mighty historical acts, right from the earliest writings (1 Thess. 5:24, “he will do it”; similarly Rom. 4:21, “God was able to do what he had promised”) to the late ones (Rev. 21:5, “I make all things new”).

2. The loving dealings of God are revealed in Jesus’ work and deeds (e.g. Acts 2:22). Again and again the question crops up as to the motivation, justification and significance of his work.

(a) The Synoptic Gospels depict the conflict with the scribes and others, which resulted from Jesus’ deeds, in the pericope on the question of authority in Matt. 21:23–27 par. Mk. 11:27 ff.; Lk. 20:1–8. Jesus replied with a question which confronted the questioners with their failure to heed the message of John the Baptist.

(b) John, later, in his “strictly Christological limitation of the usage” (TDNT VI 464), points out even more clearly in the conflict-debates that Jesus fully performs the → will and the works (→ erga) which the Father charges him as → Son to do (Jn. 5:19; 6:38; 8:53; 10:37 f.). The works of the Father and Son belong together; for both “are one” (Jn. 10:30, 33; 14:10).

(c) According to Ephesians 2:14 f., Jesus’ work consists in having “made” → peace between God and man by his death on the cross. One of the ways in which Hebrews, in a post-Pauline time, describes Jesus’ saving work is by poiēō. He “brought about” the purification of our sins (Heb. 1:3 NEB). He “made” the sacrifice for sins once and for all (Heb. 7:27). According to Rev. 1:6 and 3:12, believers are “made” kings and priests, and pillars in the future temple of God. The NT usage interprets this vb. in such a way that christology can only be unfolded in connexion with soteriological statements.

3. (a) Purely secular human activity is not particularly stressed in the NT. It covers various general activities (e.g. Mk. 11:3, 5; Jn. 19:12; Acts 9:39; Jas. 4:13).

(b) More decisive is the assessment of human action in the sight of God. Human work is never neutral; it is either obedience or disobedience vis-à-vis God's claim on men (1 Cor. 10:31, "Whatever you do, do all to the glory of God"). This expectation is expressed emphatically in the → parables of Jesus (e.g. Matt. 5:36; 20:11 ff.; 21:31; Lk. 12:17 f.; 16:3; 17:9 f.). The appropriate demand is often expressed in a relative clause (Rom. 1:32; Phil. 2:14; Col. 3:17, 23; 2 Pet. 1:10).

(c) Men's actions are subject to Jesus' claim to lordship. (Lk. 6:46 asks: "Why do you call me 'Lord, Lord', and not do what I tell you?" (cf. Matt. 7:21; Jn. 7:17). Actions reveal their worth in → love for one's neighbour (Matt. 25:40, 45; → Brother, art. ho plēsion). This is what the law is about (Matt. 22:36 ff.). It is therefore not surprising that doing – or leaving, i.e. not doing – things for or against one's neighbour is frequently mentioned in all the NT writings. It figures in different ways: positively (e.g. Matt. 5:9; 6:2 f.; Lk. 3:11; Acts 11:30; 1 Cor. 16:1; Gal. 6:9) or negatively, i.e. behaviour that is forbidden, reprehensible and loveless (e.g. Matt. 5:32; Lk. 6:26; Jas. 2:13). On account of the central significance of right action towards one's fellow-men, there is a frequent summons in the gospel of Jesus and the apostles to put the word into practice (Matt. 7:24 ff. par. Lk. 6:47 ff.; Jn. 14:12, do even greater works; Phlm. 21, do even more).

(d) The discourses of John's Gospel also speak of right action, grounded in the Lord and made possible by his Spirit. Without Christ the believer can "do nothing" (Jn. 15:5; 13:15; 14:12 ff.). Jn. 8:34–44 deals with the contrasting attitude in committing sin, which is "of the Devil" and does not stem from God and his truth.

Using poieō (1 Jn. 2:29; cf. 2:17; 3:7 ff.; 5:2), 1 Jn. retains the stress of the imperative to right action (poiōn tēn dikaiosynēn, doing righteousness). The Johannine writings indicate equally by their use of this family of words their normative significance for the beginnings of a Christian ethic.

4. (a) This actively dynamic basic trait in the NT statements, by sharp contrast with, say, quietistic Epicureanism or the Buddhist ideal of inaction, presents Christ as the poiētēs, the doer of the word and the law (Jas. 1:22, 23, 25; Rom. 2:13). Only Acts 17:28 uses the noun in the secular Gk. sense of poet.

(b) Two further terms occur only once in the NT: poiēsis, act, deed (Jas. 1:25) and agathopoiia, doing good (1 Pet. 4:19 NEB; "do right" RSV). Both their wording and their contexts show that blessing follows, "where that rhythm is achieved by which the received word overflows into action" (F. Hauck, op. cit., on Jas. 1:25). These two elements belong together and their order cannot be reversed. agathopoios, one who does good, occurs only in 1 Pet. 2:14. F. Thiele

πράσσω	πράσσω (prassō), accomplish, do; πρᾶξις (praxis), act, action, deed, function; πρᾶγμα (pragma), deed, matter, thing, undertaking, task, lawsuit, dispute; πραγματεία (pragmateia), activity, occupation, undertaking; πραγματεύομαι (pragmateuomai), do business, trade.

CL 1. In Gk. the vb. prassō (Attic prattō), to accomplish, to do, is found as early as Linear B. The original meaning of prassō could be inferred from epic phrases like prēssein hala, to cross the sea, and prēssein keleuthon or hodoio (partitive gen.), to travel along a road (Homer, Od. 9, 491; Il. 14, 282).

prassō can also be used when the subject-matter concerns procuring something, e.g. kleos epraxen, he won fame (Pindar, Isth. 5, 8). In monetary contexts, prassō means collecting or exacting payment of taxes or debts, e.g. prassei me tokon, he makes me pay interest (Homer, Batrachomyomachia 185). In general prassō denotes an “activity or industry directed to a specific goal in which the one who acts seems to be more or less claimed” (H. Schrekenberg, cf. TDNT VI 632, n. 2). It occurs in the phrase prattein ta heautou, to be concerned with one’s own affairs (Plato, Chrm. 162a), a basic ethical requisite frequently encountered in Plato. prassō can have the further meaning of betray, e.g. prattein iēn polin, to betray the city (Polyb., 4, 17, 12). As well as the transitive form, there is also the intransitive. prassō then means to act, to do. It is frequently met in the fixed formula prattein kai legein, to do and to say. Linked with an adv., it often expresses the condition or state, say of a person, e.g. eu prattō, I am doing, or I feel, well.

2. The meanings of both nouns praxis and pragma partly overlap. The older one, praxis (Hom. onwards), denotes acting, activity, and can refer to some completed deed (act, work), the way the activity is carried out (mode of operation) or a planned action (intention). Now and then it means concretely a business or an undertaking. It commonly points to a bad act, sometimes even to magical actions.

pragma (Pindar onwards), in addition to meaning deed, act, occurrence, business, task, also means a very general matter or thing, then further, concretely, a controversial matter, lawsuit, trial.

3. Already, with regard to Gk. linguistic usage, we have found that prassō is used only in rare cases for the action of the gods (cf. C. Maurer, TDNT VI 633). Even in the rare exceptional cases (e.g. Plato, Rep. 3, 391e) the vb. only refers to such doings of the gods which are not creative acts (for which the vbs. → poiein, → ergazesthai, dēmiourgein and others are used), but actions and activities which correspond to human ones, and which are in addition conceived of very abstractly. Even where prassō (following the rule) refers to human doings, a strong tendency to abstraction is characteristic of the word. If it is also used here and there in the same sense as poieō, subtle distinctions between these two verbs can still be recognized, especially in philosophic texts (e.g. Plato, Chrm. 163a ff.). Whereas poieō means more a concrete deed, prassō is used where the philosopher seeks to assess “human action apart from its content and objects” (TDNT VI 634). Thus in Platonism the necessity of right action is founded in the Idea of the Good, the knowledge of which naturally leads to kalōs prassein (e.g. Plato, Prt. 352c ff.). There is no rich tension in any contrast between knowing and doing. Defective actions are the result of defective knowledge, not of a deficient will (e.g. Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 26, 3–5).

OT 1. Compared with the occurrences of poieō in the LXX, prassō recedes very considerably. Only in post-exilic writings is it found more frequently (in all 38 instances; 8 each in Job and Prov., and 7 in 1–4 Macc.). Here prassō renders Heb. ʾāsāh (do) 5 times, pāʾal (do) 4 times and hālak (walk) twice. It is striking that prassō is variously used to describe men’s bad behaviour (e.g. Job 27:6; 36:23; Prov. 10:23; Gen. 31:28). prassō denotes positive action only in the historical books (e.g. 4 Macc. 3:20, kalōs prassein, conduct oneself well).

2. Both the nouns also occur in the LXX, pragma leading praxis by 125 attestations to only 23 (the latter mostly in Hellenistically influenced literature). Whereas the more abstract praxis is referred to human acts (e.g. 6 times in the sense of res gestae), pragma is also sometimes used for divine acts (e.g. Isa. 25:1; 28:22 [EVV 21]).

3. Philo mentions in one place the divine prattein of the Demiurge (Abr. 163). This, however, does not mean the act of creation (for which poieō is found), but an abstractly understood activity which is not given any greater precision. With reference to human beings, Philo stresses – in accord with the Stoic viewpoint – the necessity of a balanced blending of will, deed and speech. It is most proper (to oikeiōtaton) for human nature to decide (bouleuesthai), to act (prassein) and to speak (legein; Mut. Nom. 197) well (cf. TDNT VI 635).

NT Of the 39 places where prassō occurs in the NT, 18 occur in the Pauline corpus, 13 in Acts, 6 in Lk. and 2 Jn.

1. prassō never refers to a divine, creative activity in the NT (cf. for this ergazesthai and poieō). It chiefly denotes a negative and more or less abstractly conceived human action; but in some places it is also used for positive dealings, or has a neutral value.

(a) In connexion with money matters it is found in John the Baptist's preaching in Lk. 3:13, where to the tax-collectors' general question, "What shall we do?" the answer is given, "Exact no more than your rate" (JB). It is stated similarly of the master in the parable, who gave his servants ten pounds, that he wanted to draw out the money with interest on his return (Lk. 19:23). In Lk. 12:39 praktōr means a bailiff who is in charge of the debtor's prison (cf. Matt. 5:25 f.; TDNT VI 642).

(b) prassō refers to the human condition in Eph. 6:21, and linked with the adv. eu it has the sense of doing well in Acts 15:29. The shout to the jailer in Philippi is also intended to serve personal well-being: "Do yourself no harm" (Acts 16:28 NEB).

(c) Finally, prassō is used in a neutral sense in 1 Thess. 4:11, where it means one's own affairs, whereas in the same verse ergazesthai suggests physical work with one's hands. Acts 5:35 speaks generally of human action, which can turn out either well or badly. There Gamaliel warns the Sanhedrin to weigh up carefully "what you want to do" with respect to the Christians (similarly Acts 19:36 contains a warning against over-hasty action).

2. (a) prassō chiefly indicates a deed which can neither stand in the regular earthly courts (cf. Rom. 13:4; Acts 17:7; Lk. 23:41) nor before God (cf. Rom. 2:2 f.; Jn. 5:29). Formulaic phrases frequently speak of offences which deserve death, axia thanatou (Lk. 23:15; Acts 25:11, 25; 26:31; Rom. 1:32). Such evil-doing (to kakon prassein), which is finally subject to God's wrath (Rom. 13:4), is detailed in the so-called Lasterkatalogen (lists of vices) in Rom. 1:28 ff. and Gal. 5:69 ff. (→ Virtue, art. Haustafeln). An individual concrete deed – a case of unchastity – is named in 1 Cor. 5:2; prassō also refers primarily to sexual sins in 2 Cor. 12:21.

(b) The "curious arts" mentioned in Acts 19:19 with a vb.-form of prassō belong more to the religious than to the moral realm, as it is certainly a case here of magical practices (cf. E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 566 ff.; → Magic). One can also number among religious offences the betrayal of Jesus (Lk. 22:23), the killing of Jesus, brought about in ignorance by the people (Acts 3:17), and Saul's hostilities directed against the name of Jesus (Acts 26:9).

(c) The power of → temptation which to kakon prassein has is revealed in the section Rom. 7:14 ff., where prassein and poiein are used alongside each other. This temptation must be met, for anyone who does → evil (phaula) hates the → light (Jn. 3:20), anyone who does erga tēs sarkos, the works of the → flesh (Gal. 5:19), will not inherit the → kingdom of God (Gal. 5:21). In the old covenant, distinguished by circumcision, it was important to act in accordance with the law (Rom. 2:25; cf. also Gal. 6:13). In Acts 26:20, however, Paul enjoins his hearers to perform works of repentance (erga tēs metanoias), which gives prassō a positive significance. This also applies to Phil. 4:9, where Paul sets himself up as an example.

The notion that right action has its → reward is given clear expression in 1 Cor. 9:17. The definition of the relationship between human action and its eschatological valuation, there apprehended in individual terms, is developed in Jn. 5:29 in the form of general validity, in both positive and negative directions. One day the dead will leave their graves, “those who have done good [agatha poiēsantes] to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil [phaula praxantes] to the resurrection of judgment.” This verse makes it clear once again that prassō has a chiefly negative colouring. For positive activity the NT mostly has ergazesthai or poiein.

3. (a) praxis occurs in the NT 6 times. It has neutral and abstract meaning in Rom. 12:4, where it is laid down that not all the members of the body of Christ have the same function. In Matt. 16:27 praxis has to be understood ambivalently: the deed which will be judged at the parousia can be good or bad. In the other 4 places praxis refers to obviously evil actions: they refer to the words and deeds of opponents of Jesus (Lk. 23:51), the deeds of the old man viewed as a whole (Acts 19:18; Col. 3:9), and the praxeis tou somatos, “the deeds of the body” (Rom. 8:13), which must be put off or put to death.

(b) pragma (used 11 times in the NT) has a wider range of nuances. It has neutral value in Matt. 18:19, where it is used of a prayer request, and in Rom. 16:2, where it refers to Phoebe’s affairs. pragma relates to a not entirely clear matter – probably some business transaction – in 1 Thess. 4:6. It is used of judicial proceedings in 1 Cor. 6:1; and in the sense of res gestae (historical events) in Lk. 1:1. Acts 5:4 and 2 Cor. 7:11 are concerned with a concrete offence. In Jas. 3:16 pan phaulon pragma, vile practices of every kind, describes the result of jealousy and strife. In 2 Tim. 2:4 pragmateia means the affairs of everyday life, whereas the vb. pragmateuomai means to do business, trade (Lk. 19:13). diapragmateuomai means to gain by trading (Lk. 19:15).

The use of pragma in Hebrews provides a striking contrast to previous findings. In Heb. 6:18 pragma means two facts (the promise and oath of God) by means of which God declares his truth. Heb. 10:1 contrasts the → shadow of the good things to come contained in the law with the → image of the things themselves (eikōn tōn pragmatōn). Faith relates to these things, even when it cannot see them (Heb. 11:1).

Yoke

ζυγός	ζυγός (zygos), yoke, balance; ζεύγος (zeugos), a pair; ἑτεροζυγέω (heterozygeō), be unevenly yoked, fig. be mismatched; συζεύγνυμι (syzeugnymi), yoke together, join together; σύζυγος (syzygos), yoke-fellow, comrade, possibly wife.
-------	---

CL & OT 1. ho zygos, originally in Attic Gk. to zygon, has two meanings: (a) the yoke which beasts (Homer onwards) or slaves (Hdt., 7, 8, 3) wear; the cognate vb. zeugnymi means to unite, bind; to zeugos means the same as ho zygos, that which is held together under a yoke, a pair (cf. also Lat. iugum and Ger. Joch); (b) a row, beam of a balance or the balance itself (Aeschylus onwards); this meaning is suggested by the former picture of beasts braced together under a yoke.

2. The vb. heterozygeō is a development from the adj. heterozygos which is used in the LXX. Lev. 19:19 refers to beasts which are ktēnē heterozyga. Taken literally, this could refer to the practice of yoking together different kinds of animals. This, in fact, is expressly forbidden by Deut. 22:10: "You shall not plough with an ox and an ass together." Both prohibitions come in contexts which forbid mixing of crops, animals and material. The RSV interprets Lev. 19:19a as a prohibition of interbreeding: "You shall not let your cattle breed with a different kind." The thought is found in Philo, Spec. Leg. 4,203 and Josephus, Ant. 4, 228. Apart from its sole NT occurrence in 2 Cor. 6:14, the vb. is found only in Apollonius' lexicon to Homer (1st-2nd cent. A.D.). The thought of Lev. 19:19 is developed in the Mishnah tractate Kilaim (Diverse Kinds) 8:2.

3. The OT knows both meanings of zygos. (a) It is found in the LXX as a translation of mō'znayim, scales, balances (Lev. 19:36; Job 6:2; 31:6; Ps. 62[61]:9; Prov. 11:1; 16:11; 20:23; Hos. 12:8[7]; Amos 8:5; Mic. 6:11; Isa. 40:12, 15; Jer. 32[39]:10; Ezek. 45:1; 45:10; the Aram. mō'znayyā' occurs in Dan. 5:27 Theodotion). Yahweh requires true scales and honest dealings among men (Lev. 19:36; Ezek. 45:11). But he also weighs men in the balances and finds them wanting. "Men of low estate are but a breath, men of high estate are a delusion; in the balances they go up; they are together lighter than a breath" (Ps. 62:9). On the other hand, Job desires his calamities to be weighed in the balances (Job 6:2). In the background stands the idea of scales as a symbol of justice, and Yahweh himself as the ultimate judge: "Let me be weighed in a just balance, and let God know my integrity!" (Job 31:6). The MT and Theodotion's translation of Dan. 5:27 interpret the word TEKEL in the writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast: "you have been weighed in the balances and found wanting." Whereas the application of the idea of balances to judgment is found in the relatively late writings of the OT, it was widespread in later Judaism (Sl. Enoch 49:2; Eth. Enoch 61:8, the messianic judge weighs with scales the deeds of the saints). The idea was thence taken over by Christian apocalyptic pictures of judgment.

(b) More frequent in the LXX is the use of zygos (or zygon) to translate the Heb. 'ol, meaning a yoke (Gen. 27:40; Lev. 26:13; Num. 19:2; Deut. 21:3; 2 Chr. 10:4, 9 ff., 14; Isa. 9:3[4]; 10:27; 14:25; 47:6; Jer. 2:20; 5:5; 27[34]:8; 11; 28[35]:2, 4, 11, 14; 30[37]:8; Lam. 3:27). It is found for various other Heb. words (Lev. 19:35; Job 39:10; Ps. 2:3; Zech. 3:9; Isa. 5:18; 10:27; 14:5, 29; 46:6; Ezek. 34:27; Sir. 40:1; 42:4; 51:26), and is without Heb. equivalent, particularly in the non-canonical writings (Sir. 21:25; 28:19 f., 25; 33:26 [30:35]; Isa. 11:13; 19:10; Dan. 8:25; 1 Macc. 8:18, 31, 41; 3 Macc. 4:9). Originally it stood for the shaped piece of wood on the necks of draught-animals (Num. 19:2). But zygos came to stand for bondage (Lev. 26:13) and the burdensome servitude of the nation (1 Ki. 12:9 ff.). In this sense zygos became a symbol of suppression and has its Sitz im Leben in the political realm of enforced subjection and tyranny (2 Chr. 10:4, 9–14). To this context belongs the yoke which Jeremiah wore as an acted parable summoning Israel to submit to the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 27:2–11). In breaking Jeremiah's yoke, Hananiah, the prophet of national deliverance, proclaimed salvation from the foreign rule of Babylon (Jer. 28:2–11), a prophecy which was not fulfilled (Jer. 28:13–17). Ultimate liberation from suppression and enforced subjection belongs to the message of messianic prophecy (Isa. 9:3; 10:27).

4. zygos in the sense of yoke has an extended meaning. Wisdom literature speaks of the yoke of wisdom: "I open my mouth and speak of her, Acquire wisdom for yourselves without money, Bring your neck under her yoke, and her burden let your soul bear. She is nigh unto them that seek her, And he that is intent upon her findeth her" (Sir. 51:25 f.; cf. 6:24, 26, 30). This would have been understood as an invitation to accept the Torah, for wisdom at this period was identified with the → law. Lam. 3:27 contains the precept: "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." Jeremiah describes Israel's true relationship with Yahweh as a yoke which the wayward shake off (Jer. 2:20; 5:5). The latter verse defines this relationship in terms of knowledge of Yahweh and his law. Later Judaism identified the yoke with the Torah in order to give expression to submission to Yahweh's will (cf. "the yoke of the Torah", Pirke Aboth 3:5; Sanhedrin 94b; Gen. R. 67:7; "the yoke of heaven", Sotah 47b; Sanhedrin 111b; "the yoke of the commandments", Berakoth 2:2; see further SB I 608 ff.; I. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels, II, 1924, 4–14; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; M. Maher, " 'Take My Yoke upon You' (Matt. xi. 29)", NTS 22, 1975–76, 98 f.). The man who prays the Shema (Deut. 6:4–9; → Hear, art. akouō OT 2 (b), NT 3) takes upon himself the yoke of the rule of heaven. He thereby confesses that he is obligated to the one true God in all his actions. This signifies a burden which marks out Israel from all other peoples. On the other hand, it gave rise to the enslavement to legalistic piety from which Jesus sought to free his people.

5. zeugos stands chiefly for the Heb. šemed, and means a span holding a pair of animals together and hence also a couple (Jdg. 17:13, 10; 2 Sam. 16:1; 1 Ki. 19:19, 21; 2 Ki. 5:17; 9:25; Job 1:3; 42:12; Isa. 5:10).

6. zeugnymi stands chiefly for 'asar, bind (Gen. 46:29; Exod. 14:6; 1 Sam. 6:7, 10; 1 Ki. 18:44; 2 Ki. 9:21; cf. also 2 Sam. 20:8; Jud. 15:11; 1 Macc. 1:15).

syzeugnymi occurs only in Ezek. 1:11 for ḥāḇar, bind, entwine, touch (and also in v. 23 v.l.).

NT 1. zygos occurs only 6 times in the NT. (a) Only in Rev. 6:5 does it mean a balance or scales which the rider of the black horse has in his hand. The vision is a symbol of inflation and scarcity, causing hardship among the lower classes but not seriously affecting the wealthy (→ Oil, art. elaion NT 1). With regard to the oil and wine mentioned in v. 6, J. M. Ford draws attention to the Temple Scroll, rescued during the Six-Day War in Israel, which mentions two hitherto unknown feasts, a Feast of Oil and a Feast of New Wine (Revelation, Anchor Bible, 1975, 98). Oil and wine were sacrificial elements in the temple especially for the daily burnt offerings. They were kept in a special place and handled only by the priests (cf. Mishnah Middoth 2:6). Josephus describes their plundering in the time of Titus (War 5, 565).

(b) Slaves are addressed as those “who are under the yoke of slavery [hosoi eisin hypo zygon douloi]”, and are exhorted to yield to the existing social order, regarding their masters (despotas) as “worthy of all honour, so that the name of God and the teaching may not be defamed” (1 Tim. 6:1; cf. 1 Cor. 7:21 ff.; → Slave; → Lord; → Virtue, art. Haustafeln). They are not to take the law into their own hands and free themselves from servitude, as once Yahweh and Moses had called upon the Israelites to do (Exod. 3:8; 4:31; 6:6). In the case of Israel the saving event consisted in the liberation from servitude in Egypt; in the case of the church it consists first and foremost in the spiritual freedom of Christ which enables a man to be free even in physical bondage.

(c) In both form and content, Jesus’ invitation in Matt. 11:29 f. recalls the language and tradition of the → wisdom tradition: “Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me; for I am gentle and lowly in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light” (cf. Prov. 8:1 ff.; 9:5; and especially Sir. 51:25 f., see above, OT 4). On this passage see especially H. D. Betz, “The Logion of the Easy Yoke and of Rest (Matt. 11:28–30)”, JBL 86, 1967, 10–20; M. J. Suggs, Wisdom, Christology and Law in Matthew’s Gospel, 1970, 77 ff.; and M. Maher, “‘Take My Yoke upon You’ (Matt. xi. 29)”, NTS 22, 1975–76, 97–103. M. Black sees here an Aramaic word-play (An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 1967³, 183 f.). Jesus calls upon all the weary and burdened (pantes hoi kopiōntes kai pephortismenoi, v. 28) to accept his yoke. Whereas Jer. 5:5 sees the knowledge of Yahweh and his law as a yoke which is not burdensome but which wayward Israel had broken (cf. Jer. 2:20), Jesus accuses the scribes and Pharisees who sit in Moses’ seat of binding heavy burdens (phortia barea), of laying them on men’s shoulders, but of not moving them with their finger (Matt. 23:4).

The devout Jew did not consider the yoke of the law as a burden. Rabbi Nehunya ben Kanah (c. A.D. 100) declared that, “He that takes upon himself the yoke of the law, from him shall be taken away the yoke of the kingdom and the yoke of worldly care” (Pirke Aboth 3:5). Somewhat later Joshua ben Levi (c. A.D. 250) could say: “Thou findest no free man except him that occupies himself with the study of the Torah” (Pirke Aboth 6:2). Nevertheless, the way that the law was understood was not in fact a liberating experience (cf. Matt. 23 with Matt. 5:20; 6:2–18), and the immediate context of Matt. 11:29 f. underlines this point. These verses appear to inroduce a section beginning with Matt. 12:1 (“At that time . . .”) and going on to Matt. 12:50 or even 13:58, in which the various incidents and sayings illustrate the rest that men find under Jesus’s easy yoke, in contrast with the bondage that men find themselves in, when they reject God’s approach to them in Jesus because they are so set in their religious attitudes. The Son of man is Lord of the → sabbath, and therefore he may authorize the disciples to pluck grain (Matt. 12:1–8), and he may also heal on the sabbath (Matt. 12:9–16). He is the Servant on whom God’s Spirit rests (Matt. 12:17–21; cf. Isa. 42:1–4). He is the Son of David through whom God’s Spirit works and who has bound → Satan, though the Pharisees are so set in their understanding that they cannot recognize this (Matt. 12:22–32; → Swear). Despite their profession, the scribes and Pharisees bring forth evil because their hearts are not good (Matt. 12:33–37). They seek signs even though one greater than Solomon is here (Matt. 12:38–42). The last state of empty piety is worse than the first (Matt. 12:43–45). True kinship with Jesus is not something physical: “For whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother, and sister, and mother” (Matt. 12:50; cf. vv. 46–49). This leads immediately on to the → parables of the kingdom and the reflection that many took offence at Jesus (Matt. 13:1–58).

In coming to Jesus, men thus come to one who upholds the law (Matt. 5:17 f.), but also one whose interpretation of the law is not a bondage in any sense, whether recognized or unrecognized. He is the one in whom the prophecies of the law and the prophets are fulfilled (cf. Matt. 1:22 f.; 2:6, 15, 17 f., 23; 4:13–26; 12:17–21). He is the bearer of the expected salvation and the one in whom the kingdom of God has come (Matt. 4:17; 12:28). His authority has astonished his hearers (Matt. 5:21–48; 7:28 f.; 11:27; 12:41 f.; 13:17). Unlike the rabbis he does not establish his authority by citing elders or tradition. Unlike → Moses, he does not report the word of Yahweh but speaks authoritatively in his own name. He claims allegiance for his own sake (Matt. 10:39), invites people to follow him (Matt. 19:16–20), and as the risen Christ claims that all authority in heaven and earth has been given to him (Matt. 28:18). “A Christian is one who learns from Jesus not only by accepting his teaching, but also by imitating the virtues that characterized his life (cf. xi. 29). . . . The yoke of Jesus as understood by Matthew was not one of fidelity to a code but of dedication to a Person who was God’s representative among men, God with men (cf. i, 23), and who could offer rest and salvation to those who were weary and heavily burdened in their struggle for redemption and union with God (cf. xi. 30)” (M. Maher, op. cit., 103). This contrasts with the picture of the Jews in Jn. 8:33 who declared that as descendants of Abraham they had never been in bondage to anyone. They were shocked at the suggestion that they were in bondage. As Maher comments, “Their zeal in bearing the ‘yoke of the Torah’, their genuine desire to live according to the truth as made known in the law, prevented them from accepting the word of Jesus and committing themselves to his person. They regarded his offer of a new yoke as unnecessary, and they refused the new road to salvation which he pointed out to them” (ibid.).

Various early Christian writers slipped into adopting the language of Judaism, e.g. in saying that the new law imposed no “yoke of coercion” (Barn. 2:6), that the Master’s law was “the yoke of his grace” (1 Clem. 16:17), and that the follower of Christ “bore the yoke of his word” (Justin, Dial. 53, 1). Maher sees here a positive precedent for interpreting the Jewish attitude to the law in a positive way (op. cit., 101). But it may be asked whether, in thinking in terms of a new law, the early church was not already taking the first steps towards the same misconception that Judaism fell into.

(d) In Gal. 5:1, Paul may well be taking up Jewish pronouncements about the yoke of the law: "For freedom Christ has set us free; stand fast therefore, and do not submit again to a yoke of slavery." Whereas Matt. 11:29 f. juxtaposes the yoke of Jesus with the yoke of the law, Paul denounces the yoke of the law as a yoke of slavery. His reason for doing so arises out of the way in which the law was understood as something to be fulfilled as a condition of divine acceptance. In particular, → circumcision was insisted upon by a party of Jewish Christians as something required by the law as the word of God and therefore to be kept. For Paul the question of circumcision epitomized the function of the law in contemporary Judaism. To keep it, as the Judaizing party understood it, was in principle to base salvation on man's righteous acts as the precondition of divine acceptance. It was therefore fundamentally at variance with the redemptive death of Christ (Gal. 3:10–14; cf. 5:3 f.) and the Spirit-led life (Gal. 5:18). For the Christian life is based on grace and promise, and those who do not live by the promises of God are not children of God but slaves (Gal. 4:28–31). In this respect the law is just like the powers of nature (stoicheia tou kosmou) to which the Gentile readers of Gal. were formerly subject (Gal. 4:8 f.; → Law, art. stoicheia). Instead of submitting to the yoke of slavery, Paul calls upon his readers to lay hold of their freedom in Christ and to walk by the Spirit (Gal. 5:1–26).

(e) Similarly, the account of the Jerusalem council in Acts 15 reports Peter as declaring: "Now therefore why do you make trial of God by putting a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear?" (Acts 15:10). He appears to be taking up the Jewish language about the yoke of the law, and interpreting it like Paul as a yoke of bondage. For here too the issue was that of circumcision and whether it was necessary to insist that Gentile converts should be subjected to this legal prescription.

2. The adj. syzygos, yoked together, is found as a noun meaning yoke-fellow, comrade and even wife (Euripides, Alcestis 314, 342; Anthologia 8, 161, 6; 144, 2; Syntipas p. 16, 9; 18, 6; Test. Reub. 4:1; cf. Arndt, 783). The identity of the gnēsie syzyge, "true yoke-fellow", in Phil. 4:3 is not clear. Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:25 ff.) has been suggested. The Alexandrian theologians took it as an appeal to Paul's wife (Clement, Strom. 3, 53, 1; Origen, Comm. in Ep. ad Rom. 1, 1). The idea that it is a proper name like Euodia and Syntyche who are also mentioned in the same verse has received some support, but the use of the word as a name is not otherwise attested.

3. zeugos means a yoke of two animals (Lk. 14:19) and a pair (Lk. 2:24; cf. Lev. 5:11; → Bird).

4. The vb. zeugnymi meant to connect, join and is used of marital union in Mk. 10:9 v.l. Otherwise the compound syzeugnymi is used (Matt. 19:6 par. Mk. 10:9). Both vbs. are found in secular Gk. and Josephus (Ant. 6, 309; 16, 11) of marital union (cf. Arndt, 337; 783). For their precise significance in Jesus's teaching on marriage and divorce → Separate, art. chōrizō NT4.

5. In 2 Cor. 6:14 Paul uses the vb. heterozygeō which is used of the yoking of different kinds of animals in Lev. 19:19 (cf. Philo, Spec. Leg. 4, 203; Josephus, Ant. 4, 228). C. K. Barrett translates it: "You must not get into double harness with unbelievers" (The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 195). This, like the ET “do not be unequally yoked”, has the advantage of preserving the imagery of the original. The RSV, however, interprets the injunction as a warning against mixed marriages: “Do not be mismatched with unbelievers.” In favour of such an interpretation is the association of the word group in general with marriage, though this is by no means an exclusive association. In v. 16a Paul asks: “For what agreement has the temple of God with idols? For we are the temple of the living God.” In 1 Cor. 6:18 Paul has used the image of the temple as an argument against sexual immorality. But the whole context and argument of 2 Cor. 6:14 ff. appears to look beyond mixed marriages to idolatry and defilement in general (cf. C. K. Barrett, op. cit., 196), although a mixed marriage could lead to such idolatry and defilement.

This wider interpretation is, as Barrett has shown (op. cit., 195 f.), consonant with the teaching which Paul has given earlier in 1 Cor. It is not simply a Christian version of the Qumran insistence upon separation from the world and from disobedient Israel. The Christian is to remain in the world, but not be a party to idolatry and moral defilement. Thus the believer should never be guilty of fornication (1 Cor. 5:9 f.). He should bring his affairs before the church rather than take his fellow believer to the secular courts (1 Cor. 6:1–6). He should not deliberately enter upon a mixed marriage with an unbeliever, but if one of the partners in a previously pagan marriage becomes a Christian the marriage should not be dissolved simply on that account, for the believer sanctifies the marriage and the unbelieving partner may be won for Christ (1 Cor. 7:12–16, 39). The believer may not, however, eat at a table in an idol’s temple (1 Cor. 8:10 f.). Paul may become all things to all men (1 Cor. 9:21 f.), but not to the point of partaking of the Lord’s Supper and the table of demons (1 Cor. 10:21). The believer may eat with an unbeliever, but he should not knowingly eat meat that has been sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 10:27 ff.). He should not give offence to Jew or Greek, if he can avoid it (1 Cor. 10:32). Christian worship should be so conducted for an unbeliever who is present to be convicted (1 Cor. 14:24). In other words, Paul does not advocate an exclusive separation from the world. Believers are to remain in the world and seek to win it. But they are not to allow their faith to be compromised in any way, particularly by pagan idolatry and the sexual mores of the heathen. Conversion means a break with the world (1 Cor. 6:9 ff.). The church is the community of God’s elect (1 Cor. 1:1–9). The outward shape of the world is passing away (1 Cor. 7:29 ff.), and the holy people will judge the world (1 Cor. 6:2 f.).

Zeal

The intense and earnest efforts to reach a goal for which “zeal” is used in Eng. (but “jealousy” for its perversion) is expressed by various word-groups in Gk. Here zēlos and spoudē are considered; zēteō will be found under → Seek and other words are treated under → Burden. spoudē is used always in a good sense of the seriousness and effort of such activity, but zēlos, when used of selfish motives which damage or destroy fellowship, can have a bad sense.

ζῆλος

ζῆλος (zēlos), zeal; ζηλόω (zēloō), to be zealous; ζηλωτής (zēlōtēs), a zealot.

CL zēlos (from the Attic tragedians on) has zeal as its underlying idea, and means an emotional going out to a person, idea or cause. There are two clear meanings depending on the object of the zeal. Where the goal is good, zēlos means eager striving, competition, enthusiasm, admiration, and in suitable contexts praise, glory. In a bad sense, the zeal has had a wrong goal and has become a defect; it then means jealousy, ill-will, envy. Accordingly, zēlōtēs, zealot, can mean one seeking to reach good goals or a jealous man, an envious man. Equally, according to the context, the vb. zēloō can mean be zealous, consider fortunate, strive after or envy, be jealous.

OT The word-group is found only in the later portions of the LXX (e.g. Prov. 6:34), for emotions in the human realm. The concept of striving for ethical perfection – the only use found in Philo (cf. Deus Imm. 60 f.; TDNT II 879 f.) – does not appear. In its place we find zēlos with the special connotation of zeal directed to God, of the passionate readiness for service which allows itself to be controlled by the will of God, by the Law (cf. Ps. 69[68]:9; 1 Ki. 19:10, 14; 2 Ki. 15:16. “This zeal for Yahweh was laid on Israel, and the special call of Israel can be recognized by it” (O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1966¹³, 233).

More frequent are the passages that speak of God’s zeal, when it means the intensity, the uncompromising involvement with which God deals with men. Some ETs have retained the possibly misleading rendering “jealous”. In Exod. 20:5 God calls himself zēlōtēs. In connexion with this, the twofold manner in which God’s zeal works is mentioned. He turns it against the evildoers to punish them, and here zēlos connotes God’s wrath (orgē, Deut. 29:20; thymos, Num. 25:11; → Anger). On the other hand, it shows itself as → mercy towards those that fear him (Isa. 63:15). God’s zeal is especially mentioned in his rôle as Lord of history; he displays it in his support of his people Israel against the other nations (e.g. 2 Ki. 19:31; Ezek. 36:6; 38:19; Isa.

9:7; 26:11; 37:32; 42:13, RSV “fury”; 63:15, etc.). The exclusiveness of Yahweh’s relationship to Israel is shown also by his showing zēlos, i.e. jealousy, at her unfaithfulness, which is often presented as adultery (Ezek. 16:38; 23:27; → Marriage, arts. moicheuō and nymphē).

The OT usage continued in Palestinian Judaism. The Qumran texts speak of God’s zeal which is expressed in his righteous judgments. The rabbis show a certain reserve in speaking of God’s zeal or jealousy. The OT passages using zēlos are circumvented. This dislike of anthropomorphisms is seen even more clearly in Hellenistic Judaism (TDNT II 880).

NT zēlos is found 17 times in NT, zēlotēs 8 times; and the verbal forms of zēloō or zēleō 12 times.

Both the good and bad senses of the word group are found in the NT. The bad sense of jealousy is found in Acts 7:9 (of Joseph’s brothers); 5:17; 13:45; 17:5 (of the Jews’ jealousy of the apostles’ success, though the concept of zeal for God may be dimly perceived). Jealousy and strife are a deadly danger to the continued existence of a church (Jas. 3:16; cf. v. 14, 1 Cor. 3:3; 2 Cor. 12:20). A Christian must not show jealousy but is to walk by the Spirit (Gal. 5:16, 20) and deal lovingly (Rom. 13:13). The NT takes up a critical attitude not only to ethically reprehensible jealousy but also to zeal for the → law. Thus Paul rejects his previous zeal “for the traditions of my fathers” (Gal. 1:14). It was just this “being zealous for God” (Acts 22:3) that had caused him to become a persecutor of the church (Phil. 3:6). As he looked back, he recognized that he had acted as a pious Israelite who was not enlightened, as was the case with the majority of the Jews in his time (Rom. 10:2).

But zeal in itself is not rejected. Quite the contrary is true. Paul rejoiced that “godly grief” had produced repentance and zeal (2 Cor. 7:11), and he expressly called men to zeal, for it is good, if it is for Christ’s sake, who himself was zealous for God (Jn. 2:17). He expressly praised the missionary zeal which surrounds others with good (Gal. 4:18, RSV “to be made much of”; cf. 2 Cor. 11:2, where Paul speaks of “a divine jealousy”). Especially there is the call to “earnestly desire” (zēloute) the gifts of the Spirit → grace (charisma, 1 Cor. 12:31; 14:1, 12, RSV “you are eager”; 14:39), which can be rightly used in love which is free of jealousy (1 Cor. 13:4). Finally, there is a positive zeal for the welfare of others (2 Cor. 7:7; 9:2), for the right (1 Pet. 3:13) and good works (Tit. 2:14), but here too love must take pre-eminence over zeal.

zēlotēs, as an epithet for Simon (Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13), has a special meaning; it shows that he was earlier a member of the anti-Roman, theocratic, party of the Zealots. He is presumably identical with Simon the Cananean (Mk. 3:18; Matt. 10:4), where ho kananaios may translate Aram. qan’an, zealot, i.e. zēlotēs (cf. F. C. Burkitt, Syriac Forms of New Testament Proper Names, 1912, 5; Arndt, 403).

The term Zealot has been generally applied to the resistance fighters from Judas the Galilean (6 B.C.) to the defenders of the fortress Masada (A.D. 74). Josephus claimed that the entire resistance movement went back to Judas the Galilean (Ant. 18, 6). At least five resistance groups are known: the Sicarii (from the Lat. sicarius, dagger-man, assassin), beginning with Judas and ending with their mass suicide at Masada in A.D. 74, though the term is also used of Jewish refugees who fled to Egypt at the end of the war; the Zealots, a title of honour, used by the group who occupied the temple area under the priest Eleazar; the followers of John of Gischala who united with the Zealots and enjoyed a periodic realm of terror in Jerusalem (War 4, 326 f.); the followers of Simon bar Giora who controlled South Judea and who were called upon to help fight the Zealots in Jerusalem (War 4, 514, 544, 567); the Idumeans who were successively linked with the three previous groups (War, 4, 224; 4, 567; 5, 250).

When Judea was made a Roman province in 6 B.C. Judas the Galilean and Zadok the Pharisee established the "fourth school of Jewish philosophers" (War 2, 118). Judas interpreted the First Commandment to mean that none but God should be honoured as king or lord. The payment of taxes to the emperor would mean implicit rejection of this commandment. This situation sheds light on the question of paying tribute money, since it raises the question in an acute way of whether Jesus would side with this purist movement for national liberation and whether his teaching on the kingdom of God would be assimilated to Zealot ideals (Matt. 22:15–22 par. Mk. 12:13–17; Lk. 20:20–26). The Zealots themselves suffered willing martyrdom for their beliefs (Josephus, War 2, 170 f.; 3, 9). But when they captured Jerusalem in A.D. 66 the first thing they destroyed was the city archives with records of debts (War 2, 427). In A.D. 68 Simon bar Giora proclaimed general emancipation of Jewish slaves (War 4, 508).

The Zealots observed the sabbath strictly (War 2, 454). They demanded circumcision even of the heathen. Like the Pharisees, they had rigorous requirements for cleanliness. The Masada fortress contained a ritual bath and a synagogue. They appear to have held strong eschatological beliefs, which may well explain their readiness for self-sacrifice.

Some scholars have seen strong links between Jesus and the Zealot movement (cf. S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factors in Primitive Christianity, 1967). But the presence of a former Zealot among the disciples does not imply an endorsement of the movement, and to interpret the cleansing of the temple (Matt. 21:12–17 par. Mk. 11:15–19; Lk. 19:45 f.; cf. Jn. 2:13–17) as an act of resistance is to read a theory into the evidence. Jesus' teaching on the tribute money is a firm repudiation of Zealot ideals, as is his attitude to the → sabbath (e.g. Mk. 2:23–27; 3:1 ff.) and ceremonial washing (e.g. Mk. 7:15; → Baptism; → Hand).

σπουδή (soudē), zeal; σπουδαῖος (soudaios), zealous; σπουδάζω (soudazō), to be zealous.

CL From the basic vb. speudō, intrans., speed oneself, trans. hasten, strive for, there was derived the noun soudē (from Homer on), and from this in the classical period the adj. soudaios and the vb. soudazō. The word-group denotes first of all quick movement in the interests of a person or cause, and means hasten oneself (vb.), quickly (adv.), haste, speed involved in the carrying out of a matter (noun). Then it suggests inner movement, as a vb., be zealous, give oneself trouble, seek to do, be concerned for; as an adj., busy, active, industrious; as a noun, zeal, industry, effort, pains, sometimes in contrast to sloth. When they are used in contrast to play and joking, they stress serious preoccupation with something and the taking seriously of persons and things; i.e. vb., do or take seriously; adj., serious; noun, seriousness. When used with a moral connotation spoudē means willingness, good will; spoudaios implies a man concerned with the good, the virtuous man (the one aiming at aretē, virtue), the noble man. For Aristotle it is the man of true quality and morals, for the Stoics the truly moral man. In religious contexts the vb. means to involve oneself whole-heartedly; the noun means noble zeal. In Hellenistic philosophy, spoudē is used in contexts of moral effort in the individual's conquest of his environment and self-perfection. In letters it is used to reinforce urgent requests.

OT spoudē is normally used in the LXX with the meaning of urgency and haste (e.g. Gen. 19:15; Exod. 12:11, 33). Only later, and then rarely, does it mean zeal (Sir. 27:3; Wis. 14:17). There is no real equivalent in Heb. It is often used to render bāhal, be alarmed, dismayed (Job 4:5; 21:6; Isa. 21:3), which involves weakening the force of the Heb.

NT In the NT also spoudē means haste (Lk. 1:39; 2:16; 19:5 f.). It can also be so understood in Phil. 2:28; 2 Tim. 4:9, 21; Tit. 3:12; but this meaning is recognized by NEB only in the last, and by RSV not at all. In Lk. 7:4 the adv. spoudaiōs stresses the intensity of the request by which opposition should be overcome and in 2 Tim. 1:17 it brings out the intensity of the search overcoming obstacles. In 1 Thess. 2:17 the vb. underlines the intensity of Paul's efforts to see them again. The adv. is used in Tit. 3:13 for the thorough equipping of travellers. In 2 Pet. 1:15 the vb., and in Jude 3 the noun, are used in connection with the writing of an important letter.

For Paul spoudē is a necessary expression of the life of the Christian community; it determines its ethical actions and behaviour. It is a gift of God which must be developed. Its power should be seen in the effort to maintain unity (Eph. 4:3), in aiding other Christians (Gal. 2:10; 2 Cor. 8:7, 6, 16), in the making good of a wrong done (2 Cor. 7:11 f.), and in the leadership of the church (Rom. 12:8; RSV apparently understands it of practical help). All are expected to give themselves completely (Rom. 12:11), and the example can prove infectious (2 Cor. 8:8).

In the later writings of the NT spoudē has a somewhat more general and fundamental meaning. The whole conduct of life must be moulded by it, if the Christian is not to lose what he has been given and risk failure to reach the goal set before him (2 Tim. 2:15; 2 Pet. 1:5, 10; 3:12, 14; Heb. 4:11; 6:11). In such passages it expresses something of the greatness of the Christian's responsibility for the development of his life.

Other words in the NT which stress haste are nyn, now, sēmeron, today, euthys, immediately, and tachys, quickly.

IV SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

The discussion that follows is not intended as a comprehensive classification of the meanings and uses of all prepositions (“proper” and “improper”) which occur in NT Gk. (on which see the standard lexica and grammars). Attention is focused on some uses of the major prepositions which are judged to be theologically significant. There is no treatment of the meaning of prepositions in compounds (on which see Moulton, Grammar, II, 292–328).

I GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

A. The Origin and Function of Prepositions

To judge from Vedic Sanskrit and Homeric Gk., preps. were originally adjuncts to verbs, “adverbs”. How adverbs came to be attached to nouns is illustrated by Homer, Il. 11, 89, “desire for sweet food seizes his heart round about” (peri phrenas). In Homer most preps. were also used adverbially, but in the NT only rarely is this original adverbial nature of preps. apparent (e.g., hyper egō, “I more,” 2 Cor. 11:23), although words such as engys and exō are used either as adverbs or as preps. Recognizing that in origin preps. were “ad-verbs,” grammarians have traditionally (if arbitrarily) referred to preps. that can be compounded with verbs as “proper” (some 18 in the NT); those that cannot, are termed “improper” (42 in the NT).

Most preps. may denote three relations (local, temporal, mental or ideal) but the primary representation is local: (1) motion to – eis (into), pros (to); (2) motion from – ana (up from), apo (from), dia (through), ek (out of), kata (down from); (3) at rest – anti (over against), en (in), epi (upon), hyper (over, above), hypo (under, beneath), meta (behind), para (beside), peri (around), pro (before, in front of), syn (with). However, it is not always possible to trace clearly this basic spatial sense (the “root meaning”) in extended metaphorical uses of the preps. With regard to the main ideal relations, the preps. may be grouped as follows (reflecting principal usage): (1) origin (apo, ek, para); (2) cause or occasion (dia, epi, ek, apo); (3) purpose or object (eis, pros, epi, hyper); (4) result (eis, pros); (5) association or identification (syn, meta, en, dia); (6) relation (peri, hyper, pros, eis); (7) agency (hypo; sometimes apo, dia, para, or en); (8) instrumentality or means (dia, ek, en); (9) correspondence (kata, pros); (10) opposition (kata, para, pros).

Strictly speaking, from the point of view of historical development, a prep. does not “govern” the case of a noun but rather adds a certain precision to the case-meaning of the noun whose case is determined by its relation to the verb or to another noun. For example, ēlthen eis tēn polin, “he went to-the-city [acc. denoting motion to] inwards [adverb],” i.e. “he went into the city.” But, in ever-increasing measure, the case-ending itself came to be divested of special significance because inflection expressed such diversified relations, and the accompanying prep. assumed part of the meaning of the case. Therefore it is somewhat artificial to analyse the case of a noun in cl. or Hel. Gk. apart from the “meaning” of the adjoining prep.; the writers themselves probably regarded preps. as “governing” or determining the case of the noun.

In seeking to determine the meaning of a prep. phrase the NT exegete should (at least ideally) consider: (1) the primary meaning of the prep. in itself (i.e. the local relation) and then its range of meanings when used with a particular case; (2) the basic significance of the case that is used with the prep.; (3) the indications afforded by the context as to the meaning of the prep.; (4) the distinctive features of prep. usage in the NT which may account for seeming irregularities.

B. Distinctive Features of Prepositional Usage in NT Greek

1. Several characteristics are in keeping with general tendencies apparent in Hel. Gk.

(a) Preps. followed by the acc. are, in general, preferred over preps. used with the dat. (although en with the dat. gains ground and peri with the acc. loses ground in comparison with cl. usage). This occasions no surprise since the dative case, which is found in modern demotic Gk. only in a fossilized form, had already begun to be eclipsed in the NT era, although its disappearance was not complete until the tenth century A.D. (see J. Humbert, La Disparition du Datif en Grec, 1930; P. F. Regard, Contribution à L'Étude des Prépositions dans la Langue du Nouveau Testament, 1919, 325–376, 677).

(b) Prep. phrases are often used instead of simple cases (e.g., eis hymas in 1 Pet. 1:4 replaces hymis; en with the dat. serves for the simple dat.; compare Matt. 7:2 and Lk. 6:38) (see further N. Turner in Moulton, Grammar, III, 251–253).

(c) “Improper” preps., used only with the gen. (except for engys, hama and paraplēsion), become more numerous (42 in the NT), reflecting the tendency towards fuller expression and the preference for uniformity that mark Hel. Gk. (see M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, ET 1963, § 83, §§ 480 f.). For example, emprosthen (= Heb. liphnē) is preferred over pro to denote “before” in a spatial sense, although it is very rare outside biblical Gk.

(d) Preps. are commonly combined with adverbs, especially those denoting time or place (e.g., apo perysi, “a year ago”, “since last year”, 2 Cor. 8:10; 9:2) (see Regard, Prépositions, 679).

(e) In comparison with cl. Gk., the variety in the use of “proper” preps. is curtailed. When a prep. has multiple uses, the least important usage tends to disappear (Regard, Prépositions, 681). In the NT only epi, para (and pros: once with the gen.) take three cases, while the dat. is no longer used with meta, peri, and hypo (as it was in cl. Gk.). ana and anti have restricted use.

(f) Undoubtedly the tendency of the greatest significance for NT exegesis and theology is that the “overlap” or “confusion” between various preps. (when bearing certain senses) becomes more apparent. Evidence of such occasional enallage may be derived from: parallel passages in the synoptic gospels; repetition of an identical noun with different preps. within a single context or within a literary corpus; textual variants, which sometimes represent a scribal attempt to clarify meaning by removing ambiguities and irregularities in prep. use; the proleptic or pregnant use of preps., especially in a local sense; the use of two different preps. in close proximity, apparently without distinction; and, on occasion, simply the seemingly irregular use of a prep.

The more important instances of this “interchange” include the following: (i) hyper and peri (e.g., peri pollōn in Matt. 26:28 is hyper pollōn in Mk. 14:24; Lk. 22:20); following deesis, Rom. 10:1 compared with Eph. 6:18 f.; note also Jn. 1:30; Acts 8:24; 2 Cor. 1:7 f.; 7:14; 8:23; 12:8; 2 Thess. 2:1; and the textual variants in Gal. 1:4; Heb. 5:1, 3; 1 Pet. 3:18; (ii) apo and ek (e.g., Lk. 2:4; Jn. 11:1; 1 Thess. 2:6; with dekatē, Heb. 7:2, 4; Matt. 7:16 compared with Lk. 6:44; and the textual variants in Matt. 28:7; Mk. 3:8; Lk. 15:16; Acts 18:1; 2 Pet. 2:21; Rev. 1:5; 6:4; 20:9); (iii) apo and para (e.g., Jn. 13:3 compared with Jn. 16:27, 28 v.l., 30); (iv) apo or ek may stand for hypo (e.g., apo – Matt. 11:19; Acts 15:4 v.l. and cf. 15:3; 2 Cor. 7:13; ek – 2 Cor. 1:11; 7:9; cf. 1 Cor. 2:12a and b); (v) pros and eis (e.g., Mk. 5:38 f.; 11:1; Jn. 20:3; Phlm. 5); (vi) en and dia (e.g., 1 Sam. 28:6, ter; Heb. 1:2, “the en signifies dia,” Chrysostom); (vii) en and eis (e.g., Mk. 1:9; 8:26; Lk. 4:44 v.l.; 9:61; 11:7; 23:42 v.l.; with kolpos, Jn. 1:18 compared with Jn. 13:23; with cheir, Jn. 3:35 compared with Jn. 13:3; Acts 7:53; 1 Pet. 5:12); (viii) hyper may stand for anti (e.g., Jn. 11:50; Phlm. 13).

Some of these examples are debatable, to be sure, but it is now generally recognized by grammarians that in Hel. Gk. the distinction between some preps. used in certain senses was becoming more and more blurred. This is not to suggest, however, that preps. were arbitrarily or indiscriminately substituted for one another. Indeed, the incidence of such “interchange” needs to be carefully analysed, for each preposition has its own history and each writer his own idiosyncrasies. Concerning eis and en, for example, it appears that apart from Mark and Luke-Acts, where eis may stand for en and en for eis, the exegete should presume that eis retains its distinctive sense until the context or other considerations show that this is impossible or improbable (cf. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, § 106; N. Turner in Moulton, Grammar, III, 255).

2. As a result of Semitic influence, often mediated through the Septuagint, the NT use of preps. gained several distinctive characteristics.

(a) Certain preps. or prep. usages become more frequent or assume a new significance. It is not that the following constructions or uses are without parallel in contemporary papyri, inscriptions or literary usage. Sometimes it is the greater number of instances that points to direct or indirect Semitic influence. Notably, under the influence of the Heb. b^e, en often expresses accompaniment (“with”) (e.g., Mk. 5:2, 25; 1 Cor. 4:21; Heb. 9:25), instrumentality (e.g., Lk. 22:49; Rev. 6:8; and note en haimati [where en = Beth pretii, cf. Gesenius–Kautzsch, Grammar, § 119p] in Rom. 3:25; 5:9; Rev. 5:9; but cf. 1 Pet. 1:18 f.), and causality (e.g., Isa. 61:6; Matt. 6:7; Acts 7:29; 24:16; Rom. 1:24; 1 Cor. 7:14; Col. 1:21; and note the conjunction en hō, “because,” e.g., Rom. 8:3; Heb. 2:18). For a contrary view, see H. St. J. Thackeray, The Old Testament in Greek, 1903, 47. Also to be mentioned here is the frequent use of emprosthen (84 times in LXX for Heb. līpnē) (e.g., Matt. 11:26; 18:14) which is very rarely found outside biblical Gk.; the temporal force of en tō with the infinitive (a characteristically Lukan feature), reflecting the Heb. b^e with the infinitive construct; the gerundival use of the infinitive (with or without tou, eis to or pros to) [cf. the Heb. and Aram. l^e with the infinitive] (for this, see M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, §§ 391 f.) (e.g. Matt. 5:28); the frequency of prep. phrases (using apo, epi, and pro) with prosōpon (Moulton, Grammar, II, 466); the frequency of a prep. phrase with eis after ginesthai, einai or logizesthai (cf. Heb. l^e with hayâh) instead of a nominative predicate (Matt. 19:5 f., where sarx mia follows eis sarka mian; 21:42; Acts 19:27; Rom. 2:26; 4:3; 9:8; 1 Cor. 15:45, bis; 2 Cor. 6:18). G. A. Deissmann’s inscriptional parallels (Light from the Ancient East, ET 1927, 120 n. 10, 121 n. 1) to this latter construction are unconvincing since they relate only to einai eis and only to the sense “be for the purpose of.”

(b) The repetition of a prep. with each noun connected by kai, occurs so frequently in certain NT books as to be a feature of biblical Gk. attributable to Semitic influence. Of course in itself a repeated prep. need not betray Semitic practice, for any Gk. writer may repeat a prep. with several substantives in one regimen in order to highlight the distinction between them. N. Turner has ascertained that, when there is an opportunity to repeat a prep. with a series of nouns, LXX Ezekiel (B-text) accepts it 84% of the time (78:93), Revelation 63% (24:38), Romans, 1 Cor. 58% (14:24), Eph. 37% (6:16), Pastorals 17% (4:24), John 53% (8:15), Mark 38% (10:26), Matthew 31% (11:35), and Luke-Acts 23% (25:111) (Moulton, Grammar, III, 275; Moulton, Grammar, IV, 93), while such repetition is infrequent in the Ptolemaic papyri (E. Maysner, Grammatik, II, 2, 516). See the debate on this matter between A. W. Argyle (“An Alleged Semitism,” ExpT 66, 1954–5, 177; 67, 1955–6, 247) and N. Turner (“An Alleged Semitism,” ExpT 66, 1954–5, 252–254).

C. Exegetical Dangers

Not only is the detailed examination of prep. usage richly rewarding; it is an undertaking made hazardous by several pitfalls that must be carefully avoided. To isolate these hazards will be useful before we examine some of the theologically significant uses of the major preps.

1. Insistence on classical Greek Distinctions. One of the principal characteristics of NT Gk. in general, highlighted by N. Turner (Moulton, Grammar, III, 2 and passim; cf. P. F. Regard, Prépositions, 688), is the absence of cl. Gk. standards. In the days before the papyri finds from Egypt were available for comparison with the NT texts, it was not uncommon, for example, for commentators to find in the Johannine use (in Jn. 1:1, 18) of pros and eis (preps. that denote direction or movement in cl. usage) proof of an intertrinitarian relationship involving either “eternal generation” or reciprocity of fellowship. It was not recognized that in Hel. Gk. both preps. could express location; there was no need, simply because these preps. were used, to find indications of motion. Or again, the extent of the “overlap” of preps. in Hel. Gk. has not always been generally recognized (see above, I.B.1.(f)).

2. Failure to Make Adequate Allowance for a Writer’s Stylistic Variation. Given the general tendency in Hel. Gk. towards laxity of usage and overlap of function with respect to preps., the exegete should not assume that a change of prep., a change of case with a repeated prep., or the use and non-use of a prep. in successive phrases or parallel passages, always marks a change of meaning. A writer may simply wish to avoid repetition or vary his style.

It seems arbitrary and unwarranted, for example, to distinguish between ex anthrōpōn and aph’ hymōn, ap’ allōn in 1 Thess. 2:6; between apo (applying to domicile) and ek (applying to birthplace) in the Fourth Gospel (see E. A. Abbott, Johannine Grammar, 1906, §§ 2289 f.), since the distinction is inapplicable in 6:33, 41; 7:41 f.; 11:1 (and note that both apo and ek are used with tou ouranou katabēbēka, 6:38, 42); between hon and hyper hou in Jn. 1:15, 30; between peri pantōn tōn hagiōn and hyper emou after proseuchomenoi in Eph. 6:18 f., as if Paul were indicating that “all the saints” were to be the subject (peri) of his addressees’ prayer but that his own welfare (hyper) was also to be their prayerful concern; between pros and eis in Rom. 3:25 f. and in Phm. 5; between dia doxēs and en doxē in 2 Cor. 3:11; between epi with the dative and genitive in Eph. 1:10; between nekroi tois paraptōmasi (Eph. 2:1) and nekroi en tois paraptōmasi (Col. 2:13); between logō, tē glōssē, and en ergō in 1 Jn. 3:18; between ek pisteōs and dia tēs pisteōs in Rom. 3:30 (see below, II.E.2.(d)).

3. Disregard of Probable Distinctions. This danger is the opposite of the last. A writer must be permitted to alter his terminology either to vary his style but not change his meaning or to express a distinction in sense. One must assume that a writer chooses his preps. with care. In the discussion of 2 Jn. 7, to treat en sarki as equivalent to eis sarka would be to embrace a species of Apollinarianism. As it is, Jesus Christ came “in the flesh,” not “into flesh.” In 1 Pet. 1:23 regeneration is said to have its origin or source (ek) in an act of immortal procreation or in imperishable seed, but is effected by means of (dia) the living and abiding word of God. To cite another example, Paul disowned his adequacy, on his own initiative or in his own wisdom (aph’ heautōn), to reckon any positive result of his ministry as actually originating from himself (ex heautōn). Only God was able to assess the true outcome of his ministry and supply the power for its accomplishment (2 Cor. 3:5). In the interpretation of the last clause of the Lord’s Prayer (Matt. 6:13b), it is relevant to observe that not ek but apo follows rhysai. In the NT rhyesthai ek denotes deliverance from non-personal evil (7 times; note especially 2 Pet. 2:9, ek peirasmou), never personal enemies, while (elsewhere) apo is twice used with persons (Rom. 15:31; 2 Thess. 3:2) and once with a non-personal object (2 Tim. 4:18). These tendencies conform with general LXX usage (see especially Ps. 39:2, LXX). From the viewpoint of linguistic usage, then, the probability is that tou ponērou means “the Evil One” rather than “evil” (see J. B. Bauer, “Liberate nos a malo”, Verbum Domini 34, 1956, 12–15). Or again, in 2 Pet. 3:5 the earth is said to have been formed out of the material of water or to rise from and above water (ex hydatos) (a gloss on Gen. 1:2, 6–8) and to stand amidst water or to exist by the action of water (in descending to fill low areas and ascending to form clouds) (di' hydatos).

In addition, a distinction usually should be drawn between the same preposition used in the same sentence or in parallel or similar passages with different cases (e.g., dia in 1 Cor. 11:9, 12; Heb. 2:10; but note epi with the gen. and acc. in Matt. 19:28 and with the acc. and dat. in Matt. 24:2 and Mk. 13:2 v.l., in parallel passages, with apparently no difference in meaning).

4. Denial of a Double Entendre. No one will doubt that a repeated preposition may bear two different senses with the same case within one sentence (e.g., 2 Cor. 2:12, local and telic eis expressing movement and purpose; Heb. 9:11 f., instrumental dia and dia expressing attendant circumstances; 2 Pet. 1:4, local and instrumental en). But in addition it seems illegitimate, simply on a priori hermeneutical principles, to exclude the possibility that on occasion an author may use a single preposition in a dual sense. For example, it is not because of any reluctance to make a decision between evenly balanced exegetical possibilities but because the author may have intended a double meaning that some commentators (e.g., E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter, 1946, 202 f.; J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and of Jude, BNTC, 1969, 159) take diesōthēsan di' hydatos in 1 Pet. 3:20 to mean both “they were brought safely through water” (local dia) and “they were preserved by means of water” (instrumental dia). Kelly’s rendering, “a few (eight persons, in fact) were saved through water” (op. cit., 158), retains the ambiguity in translation. 1 Tim. 2:15 affords a comparable example. The woman who continues in faith, love, holiness and modesty will be “saved through child-bearing” (sōthēsetai . . . dia tēs teknogonias). Does the exegete have to choose between the concepts of “priority in time” and “supremacy in rank” in discussing autos estin pro pantōn in Col. 1:17 (cf. F. F. Bruce in Commentary on The Epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians, NLC, 1957, 200: “the words not only declare His temporal priority to the universe, but also suggest His primacy over it”; so also B. F. C. Atkinson, The Theology of Prepositions, 1944, 8, but with a reversal of emphasis)? Certainly, editors of the Greek text must choose between two accentuations of estin; but Moffatt appears to reproduce the ambiguity of pro in his translation “he is prior to all”. But care needs to be exercised in determining an intended double entendre. It would scarcely be defensible to find in the phrase en pneumatī hagiō (which appears in the midst of a catalogue of moral virtues, 2 Cor. 6:6) both the sense “in holiness of spirit” and the meaning “by gifts of the Holy Spirit” (NEB).

But what of prepositional phrases that may be construed either with what precedes or with what follows? Is a double entendre ever to be found here? Probably not. The exegete must choose between “Christ is the goal of the law, and so [ebatic eis] righteousness is available to every believer” and “In the case of every believer, Christ is the end of the law viewed as a means of gaining (telic eis) righteousness” (or, “in its relation to righteousness,” referential eis) (eis dikaiosynēn) (Rom. 10:4; cf. 10:5; Phil. 3:9). Similarly, in the Pauline citation of Habakkuk 2:4 in Rom. 1:17 and Gal. 3:11, ek pisteōs must be taken either with ho (de) dikaios (“it is the person who is righteous by faith that will live”) or with zēsetai (“the person who is righteous will live by faith”). It would hardly be permissible to affirm that Paul is saying both that faith is characteristic of the life of the person who is righteous before God and that faith in Christ is the means to divine approval and eternal life. There is a comparable ambiguity of construction in Lk. 4:21; Jn. 3:15; Acts 22:3; Rom. 4:18; 1 Cor. 3:13; 2 Cor. 5:16; Phil. 2:13; Col. 3:16; 1 Thess. 4:14; Heb. 2:9; 9:11.

5. Neglect of the Possible Significance of (a) the Non-repetition of the Preposition with Copulated Nouns, and (b) the Order of Nouns that follow a Preposition. Generally speaking, a prep. tends to be repeated before a series of nouns joined by kai more frequently in biblical Gk. (under Semitic influence) than in non-biblical Gk. (see above, I.B.2.(b)). Sometimes, therefore, the non-use of a second or third prep. in NT Gk. may be theologically significant, indicating that the writer regarded the terms that he placed in one regimen as belonging naturally together or as a unit in concept or reality. ex hydatos kai pneumatos (Jn. 3:5) shows that for the writer (or speaker) "water" and "Spirit" together form a single means of that regeneration which is a prerequisite for entrance into the kingdom of God (= birth anōthen, Jn. 3:3, 7). No contrast is intended between an external element of "water" and an inward renewal achieved by the Spirit. Conceptually the two are one. Similarly, in Matt. 3:11 the phrase en pneumati hagiō kai pyri points not to two baptisms (viz., the righteous with the Holy Spirit, the wicked with fire), but to a single baptism in Spirit-and-fire, that may be interpreted either as the messianic purification and judgment that would be effected by the Spirit (cf. Isa. 4:4; 30:28) and experienced by all, or as the outpouring of the Spirit on believers at Pentecost that would refine and inflame them. (See further on these two examples J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit, SBT, Second Series 15, 1970, 8–14, 190–192.) The fact that "God our Father" and "the Lord Jesus Christ" are joined together under the bond of a single prep. (apo) in all Pauline salutations (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:3) suggests that the apostle envisaged the Father and the Son as a joint source of "grace and peace," rather than as distinct sources or as source and channel (respectively). They sustain a single relation (not two diverse relations) to the grace and peace that come to believers.

A related matter concerns the order of nouns that follow a prep. (see the discussion of A. Buttmann, A Grammar of the New Testament Greek, ET 1873, § 295). If a prep. is followed by two anarthrous substantives both in the genitive case, it always qualifies the former. ex ergōn nomou (Rom. 3:20; Gal. 2:16 bis; 3:2, 5, 10) means "by the works of the law," not "by the principle of works." (Cf. ek dexiōn mou, Matt. 20:23, 22:44; dia mesou autōn, Lk. 4:30.) Thus in 2 Cor. 3:18 apo kyriou pneumatos does not mean "by the Spirit of the Lord," but "by the Lord (= Yahweh, 3:16 f.) who is the Spirit" or "by the Lord (Jesus) who is spirit" (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45; 2 Cor. 3:6). Even when the prep. is followed by a noun in a case other than the genitive, the limiting genitive generally follows the prep. phrase (e.g. eis aphesin hamartiōn, Mk. 1:4; but note the exceptional Matt. 13:33; Rev. 7:17). Similarly, when the nouns involved are articular, any limiting genitive usually follows the prep. phrase (e.g., apo tou nomou tēs hamartias kai tou thanatou, Rom. 8:2), but occasionally it may be inserted according to the ABBA word-order (e.g., ek tēs tou diabolou pagidos, 2 Tim. 2:26).

II SOME THEOLOGICALLY IMPORTANT INSTANCES OF THE MAJOR PREPOSITIONS

References to discussions of individual preps. in the standard monographs on the subject (viz., R. Helbing, M. Johannesson, F. Krebs, W. Kuhring, C. Rossberg) may be found in the relevant footnotes in Moulton, Grammar, III, 249–280.

A. anti

Since the root sense of anti is “(set) over against, opposite” (cf. German ant- in antworten), the prep. naturally came to denote equivalence (one object is set over against another as its equivalent), exchange (one object, opposing or distinct from another, is given or taken in return for the other), and substitution (one object, that is distinguishable from another, is given or taken instead of the other).

1. Equivalence (“for”, “as the equivalent of”; cf. Homer, Il., 9, 116 f.). Under the lex talionis (Exod. 21:23–25), one eye was required as equivalent compensation for another eye (ophthalmon anti ophthalmou, Matt. 5:38), a tooth for a tooth. In 1 Cor. 11:15 Paul’s point is not that a veil is superfluous for a woman since nature has given her hair in place of a covering, but rather, arguing analogically, he infers from the general fact that “hair has been given to serve as a covering” (anti peribolaïou) (p⁴⁶D G omit autē, “to her”) that the more generous supply of hair that a woman has when compared with a man shows the appropriateness of her being covered when she prays or prophesies in the Christian assembly.

2. Exchange (“in return for”, “for the price of”). In return for evil received (anti kakou) the Christian is not to do evil (Rom. 12:17; 1 Thess. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9), when abused he is not to give abuse in exchange (loidorian anti loidorias, 1 Pet. 3:9). It was for the price of a meal (anti brōseōs) that Esau sold his birthright (Heb. 12:16; see Arndt, 73 s.v. anti 3).

3. Substitution (“instead of”, “in the place of”). It is improbable that anti ever has the diluted sense of “for the benefit of”, “on behalf of”. The half-shekel tax alluded to in Matt. 17:24 was regarded as redemption money (Heb. kōper, LXX lytron, Exod. 30:12) that would release the donor from hypothetical slavery or absolve him from the divine anger (cf. T. Shek. 1:6). Accordingly, when Jesus commanded Simon Peter to give the collectors the shekel he would find in the fish’s mouth anti emou kai sou (“for me and for yourself”, Matt. 17:27), Matthew probably wished his readers to understand that the redemption tax was a substitutionary offering designed to release the giver from obligation (see further R. E. Davies, “Christ in our place – the Contribution of the Prepositions”, TB 21, 1970, 79 f.; N. Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament, 1965, 173). In its prevailing sense in LXX Gk. (see M. Johannesson, Der Gebrauch der Präpositionen in der Septuaginta, 1926, 198–200), as in non-biblical Gk. (e.g., Xen. Anab. 1, 1, 4) including the papyri (Moulton-Milligan, 46; cf. antis in modern Gk.), anti clearly denotes a substitutionary exchange. Abraham offers up the ram as a burnt offering instead of (anti) Isaac his son (Gen. 22:13). Judah offers to remain in Egypt instead of (anti) Benjamin as a slave to Joseph (Gen. 44:33). Lamenting the death of his son Absalom, David says “Would that I had died instead of [anti] you, I instead of [anti] you” (2 Sam. 19:1, LXX). Archelaus reigns over Judea in place of (anti) his father Herod (Matt. 2:22). See also Lk. 11:11; Jas. 4:15. In Jn. 1:16 charin anti charitos (“grace upon grace”; “one blessing after another”, New International Version) denotes a perpetual and rapid succession of blessings, as though there were no interval between the arrival of one blessing and the receipt of the next. Alternatively, the idea of constant renewal may be less prominent than the notion of the replacement of “old” grace by “new” grace (sometimes taken to refer to the spiritual presence of the Holy Spirit in place of the physical presence of Christ). Two disputed passages remain to be discussed. When the author of Hebrews observes that Jesus endured the cross anti tēs prokeimenēs autō charas (Heb. 12:2), the meaning of the prep. phrase could be (a) “in exchange for” or “in order to obtain” the joy that was in prospect for him, that of seeing “the fruit of the travail of his soul” (Isa. 53:11); or (b) “instead of” the joy of continued fellowship in God’s immediate presence that lay before him as a distinct possibility within his grasp. The second alternative seems preferable in light of: the use of prokeimai in Heb. 6:18; 12:1 (cf. 2 Cor. 8:12) to denote a present reality; the prevailing substitutionary sense of anti; the inappropriateness of any hint of reciprocal bargaining between Jesus and God, or of personal advantage as the primary motive of Jesus for his suffering; the parallel in 11:25 f. with reference to Moses. (This view is defended by P. Andriessen and A. Lenglet, “Quelques passages difficiles de l’Épître aux Hébreux (5:7, 11; 10:20; 12:2)”, Bib. 51, 1970, 207–220.) Finally, anti pollōn in Mk. 10:45 (= Matt. 20:28) should be construed not with dounai (“to give . . . on behalf of [= hyper] many) but with lytron (“a ransom in the place of many”). The life of Jesus, surrendered in a sacrificial death, brought about the release of forfeited lives. He acted on behalf of the many by taking their place. As in 1 Tim. 2:6 (antilytron hyper pantōn), the notions of exchange and substitution are both present. It is hardly a sound hermeneutical procedure to appeal to a contestable “wider” sense of anti (viz. “on behalf of”) in Matt. 17:27 (or Gen. 44:33) as the key to the proper understanding of anti in this passage where the customary sense of the prep. (viz., exchange-substitution) gives an unobjectionable meaning and the term lytron is applied to a human life. For a discussion of the theological implications of “substitution”, see J. I. Packer, “What did the Cross achieve? The Logic of Penal Substitution”, TB 25, 1974, 3–45.

B. apo

1. apo and ek. In general they are related as ab is to ex in Lat. apo denotes motion from the edge or surface of an object; ek, motion from within. But often apo marks simply the general point from which movement or action proceeds. Thus “Joseph went up from [apo] Galilee, out of [ek] the city of Nazareth” (Lk. 2:4). However the fact that apo is regularly used with exerchomai in Lk. (13 times) shows that even the broad distinction is not everywhere applicable. In fact the process in which apo ultimately absorbed ek has already commenced in Hel. Gk. So we find that both preps. may be used in the following senses: (a) temporal (e.g., apo, Matt. 11:12; ek, Jn. 9:1); (b) causal (apo, Matt. 18:7; Lk. 19:3; Acts 12:14; 22:11; ek, Jn. 4:6; Rev. 16:10–12); (c) instrumental (apo, Matt. 11:19 = Lk. 7:35; ek, Lk. 16:9; Jn. 6:65); (d) adverbial (apo, 2 Cor. 1:14; 2:5; ek, 2 Cor. 9:7); (e) to denote place of origin (apo and ek together, Jn. 1:44; 11:1); (f) to denote membership (apo, Acts 12:1 “church members”; ek, Acts 6:9 “members of the synagogue”). Such overlapping of function between apo and ek makes one hesitate to distinguish between the ek tou hydatos of Mk. 1:10 (cf. Acts 8:38 f.) and the apo tou hydatos of Matt. 3:16 (both phrases being preceded by a form of anabainō, “go up”), as though the later Matthean tradition testified to baptism by affusion or aspersion rather than by immersion (as in the Markan tradition). The preps. throw no definitive light on the matter (pace N. Turner, Insights, 29; but see his earlier remark in Moulton, Grammar, III, 259). The most that may be said, if the preps. are here distinguishable, is that Matthew's apo does not exclude Mark's ek. On the relation of apo to hypo, see below II.I.2. For the influence of the Heb. prep. min on the NT use of apo, see Moulton, Grammar, II, 460–462.

2. Some Notable Instances of apo.

(a) 1 Cor. 11:23. In the controversial phrase apo tou kyriou (D reads para) the use of apo is in itself indecisive as to the nature of the transmission and accords with either of the following views: (i) the Lord was the ultimate origin of a tradition that reached Paul in reliable form through unbroken transmission; (ii) the Lord was the immediate source or originator of the tradition or the authority constantly operating through human tradition and confirming it by his Spirit. That intermediaries were involved is not suggested by the use of apo (as though para necessarily implied immediate communication) but by the two verbs paralambanō (= Heb. qibbēl) and paradidōmi (= Heb. māsar) which were technical terms for the transmission of tradition. See the discussions of E. B. Allo, Première Épître aux Corinthiens, 1956², 309–316; O. Cullmann, “Kyrios as Designation for the Oral Tradition concerning Jesus”, SJT 3, 1950, 180–197.

(b) Heb. 5:7. eisakoustheis apo tēs eulabeias could mean “his prayer was heard (and so he was delivered) from his anxious dread (of death),” but more probably apo is causal (“he was heard on account of his godly fear”) since eulabeia in Heb. 12:28 and eulabeomai in Heb. 11:7 both refer to reverent awe before God. But see Funk, § 211.

(c) Rev. 1:4. The remarkable phrase (eirēnē) apo ho ōn kai ho ēn kai ho erchomenos has been explained as: the result of the Seer's reverence for the divine name which kept him back from submitting it to declensional change (R. H. Charles, The Revelation of St. John, ICC, 1920, I, 10); a paraphrase of the indeclinable tetragrammaton YHWH, “He who is” (J. M. Ford, Revelation, Anchor Bible, 1975, 376); a nominative apposition which was originally preceded by four dots standing for the tetragrammaton (G. Mussies, The Morphology of Koine Greek as Used in the Apocalypse of St. John, 1971, 93 f.).

C. dia

Originally dia signified “passing through and out from,” a sense reflected in Matt. 4:4 (“... every word that proceeds from [ekporeuomenō dia] the mouth of God”) and 1 Cor. 3:15 (“he himself will be saved, but only as one who escapes through fire”, dia pyros). When this notion of “extension through” is applied to temporal categories, the meaning is “during the course of” (e.g., dia nyktos, “during the night”, Acts 23:31). In itself di' hēmerōn tesserakonta (Acts 1:3) could mean either “continuously throughout a 40-day period” (though this would more commonly be expressed by tesserakonta hēmeras) or “intermittently (or repeatedly) during the course of 40 days” (cf. Acts 13:31, “over a period of (epi) many days”), but the references to “many (separate) convincing proofs” (1:3a) and to various self-presentations (1:3a; parestēsen is a constative aorist) and repeated appearances (1:3b; optanomenos implies iteration) clearly show that the prep. here signifies “intermittently throughout” (so also Funk, § 223 (1) and see references in A. Oepke, dia, TDNT II 66 n. 3). Earth was not necessarily the place of Jesus' whereabouts in the interval between his resurrection and ascension.

1. Means or Instrument. From the local sense of dia there naturally developed the instrumental sense, which marks the medium through which an action passes before its accomplishment. Thus, in the expression pistis di' agapēs energoumenē (Gal. 5:6), love is specified as the means by which faith becomes visibly operative or effective. Expressions of love (= good works) must intervene between faith in its infancy and faith in its maturity. Thus stated, Paul's view of the interrelationship of faith and (good) works is similar to that of James (Jas. 2:14–26). Several more examples of this instrumental use of dia may be given. Paul represents the angels not as the authors (hypo) of the law but as the mediate agents (dia in its enactment or transmission, Gal. 3:19). When the apostle says that at the tribunal of Christ recompense will be received for both good and bad actions that have been performed by means of the earthly body (dia tou sōmatos, 2 Cor. 5:10) and therefore during life on earth, he excludes the possibility of reward or punishment for any conceivable post-mortem action. Again, everything that pertains to life and godliness is granted to believers by God's divine power but comes through (dia) the knowledge of Christ (2 Pet. 1:3). Sometimes, however, dia seems to express not the efficient cause but the principal or sole cause, not mediation but agency (e.g., Rom. 11:36 where God the Father is designated the source (ek), agent (dia), and goal (eis) of all creation; 1 Cor. 1:9; Heb. 13:11). It follows, as M. Zerwick observes, that when the rôle of Christ as creator (e.g., Jn. 1:3, 10) or redeemer (e.g., Rom. 5:9) is expressed by dia, the idea of his mediation may not be prominent (Biblical Greek, § 113). Accordingly, Col. 1:16 (ta panta di' autou . . . ektistai) may be emphasizing the agency, rather than the mediation, of Christ in creating and sustaining the universe. On the other hand, in 1 Cor. 8:6 the function of God the Father as the source of creation (ex hou ta panta) is distinguished from Christ's rôle as mediator of creation (di' hou ta panta), while in 2 Cor. 5:18 God is the reconciler and Christ the divinely appointed means (dia Christou) of reconciliation (cf. Rom. 5:11; Col. 1:20). On the relation between dia and hypo, see below, II.I.1.

2. Attendant Circumstances. Not infrequently dia expresses the circumstances that accompany an action or state, and in this function the prep. overlaps with en. Abraham received the sign of circumcision as a seal of the faith-righteousness which he had while he was as yet uncircumcised (en tē akrobystia), thus becoming the father of all who are believers while being uncircumcised (di' akrobystias) (Rom. 4:11). Since, then, dia may denote accompaniment as well as instrumentality, it is special pleading to distinguish between meta in 1 Tim. 4:14 (used of the elders' imposition of hands) and dia in 2 Tim. 1:6 (used of Paul's imposition of hands) in regard to the consecration of Timothy, as if an apostolic laying on of hands were a prerequisite for "ordination" while the imposition of presbyters' hands was simply a desirable concomitant (contra F. Prat, The Theology of St. Paul, ET 1945, II, 270 n. 1). On the other hand, if dia tēs epitheseōs tōn cheirōn mou (2 Tim. 1:6) does denote the instrumental cause of Timothy's receipt of his gift, the actual participation of the body of elders in this imposition of hands need not be excluded: the presbytery and the apostle may have acted conjointly. The use of meta rather than dia in 1 Tim. 4:14 may well be explained (on this view) by the presence of another dia phrase (dia prophēteias). dia pisteōs in 2 Cor. 5:7 also probably belongs to this category of accompanying circumstances (“we walk in the realm of faith, not of sight”) since it is difficult to take (peripatoumen ou) dia eidous in a modal sense. This use of dia extends even to marking circumstances that turn out not to help but sometimes even to hinder an action. “Even with” (= “in spite of one’s having”) the written code and circumcision (dia grammatos kai peritomēs), transgression of the law occurs (Rom. 2:27; cf. 5:20a), although one would expect such circumstances to aid in keeping the precepts of the law. dia tou pneumatos in Acts 21:4 is difficult, since the advice not to go on to Jerusalem given to Paul by the Tyrian disciples (= prophets? cf. Acts 11:28) “through the Spirit” conflicted with his own resolve “in the Spirit” (en tō pneumati, Acts 19:21) and with the constraint and testimony of the Spirit (Acts 20:22 f.). It is noteworthy that Agabus’s subsequent prophecy at Caesarea (Acts 21:11) that predicts Paul’s suffering in Jerusalem and begins “Thus says the Holy Spirit” does not include an injunction or exhortation to Paul not to go to Jerusalem (but cf. Acts 21:12–14). Perhaps therefore the crucial prep. phrase in Acts 21:4 should be rendered “while under the inspiration of the Spirit” (but C. F. D. Moule, Idiom-Book, 57 tentatively suggests “as a spiritual insight”). In his condensed statement Luke has not distinguished between a prophecy regarding Paul’s suffering at Jerusalem (doubtless given by the Tyrian disciples before their exhortation) that was delivered at the direction of the Spirit (cf. Acts 21:11) and their own personal exhortation (cf. Acts 21:12) that was occasioned by the prediction and immediately followed it. The verse may be paraphrased thus: “Prompted by a prediction of the Spirit they told Paul not to go on to Jerusalem.”

3. Cause or Ground. The two principal non-local meanings of dia are “by means of”, “through” (Lat. per) and “on account of”, “because of” (Lat. ob and propter). The inter-relation of these two senses is evident from the fact that dia with the acc. may occasionally denote the efficient cause (e.g., Jn. 6:57a, the Father is the source of the Son’s life, as in Jn. 5:26; Rev. 12:11; see Arndt 180, s.v. dia, B. II. 4), and is well illustrated by the textual variants in Rom. 8:11, where the revivification of mortal bodies is attributed to the agency of the indwelling Spirit (dia with gen.) who already is active in the transformation of character (2 Cor. 3:18) or (in the inferior reading of dia with acc.) it is grounded in the fact that a life-giving Spirit (Rom. 8:2; 1 Cor. 15:45; 2 Cor. 3:6) indwells believers, the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead. On other occasions these two most common uses of dia are found juxtaposed (in paronomasia, Heb. 2:10 where di’ hou refers to the Father as the principal cause and di’ hon perhaps stands for the Pauline ex autou kai . . . eis auton [Rom. 11:36]; 1 Cor. 11:9, dia tēn gynaika, and 11:11, dia tēs gynaikos; and cf. Rom. 12:3 and 15:15).

4. Purpose. Just as there has been debate whether eis ever bears a retrospective (= causal) sense in the NT (see below, II. D. 3), so there is no unanimity concerning the alleged prospective (= telic) sense of dia. If, occasionally, it were to bear this meaning in the NT, it should occasion no surprise since: (a) dia with the acc. exceptionally has a prospective sense in cl. Gk. (e.g., Thuc., History, ii. 89. 2; v. 53; Aristot., Eth. Nic., 4, 3, 31; Plato, Rep. 524 C – cited by H. G. Meecham “Romans iii, 25 f., iv, 25 – the meaning of dia c. acc.”, ExpT 50, 1938–9, 564; cf. Liddell-Scott, 389 s.v. dia B. III. 3) and Hel. Gk. (e.g., Polyb. 2, 56, 12); (b) in modern Gk. yia (= dia) with the acc., “for,” is used to express purpose (G. N. Hatzidakis, Einleitung in die neugriechische Grammatik, 1892, 212 f.). There are, in fact, several NT examples where dia approaches a prospective sense (Matt. 24:2; Mk. 2:27; Jn. 11:42; 12:30; Rom. 11:28; M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, § 112, compares the dia touto . . . hina formula in Rom. 4:16; 1 Tim. 1:16; Phlm. 15), but the alleged instances that are most regularly adduced are Rom. 3:25; 4:25. In the former verse dia tēn paresin seems to mean “on account of his passing over” rather than “with a view to (or, through) his forgiving”. Paul is observing that the purpose or outcome of God’s provision of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice was the demonstration of his own righteousness, a righteousness that needed vindication because, in his patience (not his indifference), God had refrained from exacting the full and proper penalty for acts of sin committed previously. God had not always left sin unpunished, but he had temporarily suspended, withheld or set aside appropriate punishment in light of his eternal purpose to provide an altogether adequate basis for the forgiveness of sin in the atoning death of Christ. It seems that paresis (= remission of punishment or debt) should be distinguished from aphesis (= remission of sin) (references in Moulton-Milligan, 493 s.v. paresis, and the distinctive view of S. Lyonnet, Exegesis Epistulae ad Romanos, 1963³, 217 f., 222–238, that this whole phrase refers to the provisional and anticipatory remission of sin accorded the Jewish people) and that an unusual telic or instrumental sense need not be given to dia with the acc. when the more regular causal meaning accords with the context. The matter is more complex in Rom. 4:25, where there is a parallelism between the two dia phrases (dia ta paraptōmata hēmōn and dia tēn dikaiōsin hēmōn) that would suggest prima facie that each should be taken in the same sense, yet a causal sense is difficult in v. 25b (viz. “and was raised to life because of our justification”). Three solutions may be mentioned (in ascending order of probability). (i) dia in final in both clauses: “in order to deal with”, v. 25a (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3); “with a view to”, v. 25b. (ii) dia is causal in v. 25a (“because of”; cf. Isa. 53:12, LXX) but final in v. 25b (“in order to achieve”, or, better, “to confirm [or, guarantee]”). (iii) dia is causal in both clauses: “because of (the need to atone for)”, v. 25a; “because of (the need to achieve or confirm)”, v. 25b (cf. the parallel in Rom. 13:5); or, alternatively, just as the delivering up of Jesus to death was the consequence of our sin, so his resurrection was the consequence of our justification (that had been achieved by his death, Rom. 5:9 f.). On this latter view, the conceptual sequence would then be: our sin – Jesus’ death – our justification – Jesus’ resurrection, with the resurrection being here regarded as the inevitable consequence of, and the seal of divine approval on, Christ’s procurement of our justification. But see per contra D. M. Stanley, Christ’s Resurrection in Pauline Soteriology, AnBib 13, 1961, 171–173.

D. eis

1. Its relation to other Preps.

(a) pros. Although the distinctions are not uniformly maintained, it is generally true that with regard to literal movement eis denotes entry (“into”) and pros approach (“up to”), and (correspondingly) that eis is used with impersonal objects and pros with personal (e.g., 2 Cor. 1:15 f.; and see the argument of E. de W. Burton, The Epistle to the Galatians, ICC, 1921, 96–99, based on Paul’s twofold use of eis in Gal. 2:9, that the apostolic division of labour was primarily territorial [Jewish lands – Gentile lands] rather than racial [Jews – Gentiles]). That these are simply tendencies is apparent from Mk. 5:38 f.; Jn. 20:3–6, 8; Phlm. 5. As for metaphorical use, both preps. may express purpose (e.g., Rom. 3:25 f.) and result (e.g., eis, Rom. 1:20; pros, 1 Jn. 5:16 f., on which see below II. N. 3).

(b) en. There are two reasons why it is not surprising that eis and en shared some common territory in Hel. Gk. (i) Etymologically eis was a later variation of en, being originally ens, the s having been added to en on the analogy of ex (= ek-s). With the disappearance of the n in ens, compensatory lengthening produced eis (see A. T. Robertson, A Grammar of the Greek New Testament, 1934⁴, 584–586, 591). The obsolescence of the dat. case in Gk. meant the disappearance of en from the modern Gk. vernacular where only eis (with the acc.) is found (cf. G. N. Hatzidakis, Grammatik, 210 f.). (ii) Hel. Gk. is marked by a general tendency to confuse the categories of linear motion (“to”) and punctiliar rest (“in”). The confusion was in both directions: eis denoting position (e.g., Gen. 37:17A; Jos. 7:22) and en implying movement (e.g., Exod. 4:21; Tob. 5:5). Examples of this interchange are not lacking in cl. Gk. but they are relatively infrequent, especially in narrative.

It was observed above (I. B. 1 (f)) that the interchange of eis and en is not promiscuous in NT Gk. and that the idiosyncrasies of each author must be examined. Only in Mk. and Lk.-Acts does this interchange occur with any frequency. In Rev. there is only one clear example (Rev. 11:11, where, surprisingly, the eis of Ezek. 37:10 [LXX] has become en). All the apparent exceptions in the Fourth Gospel to the cl. use of eis and en have been examined by J. J. O’Rourke, who concludes that only in Jn. 1:18 and 19:13 does eis possibly stand for en (1.08% of Jn’s. 183 uses of eis) and only in Jn. 3:35 is en (218 uses) possibly used for eis (“EIS and EN in John”, Bible Translator 25, 1974, 139–142).

What did John mean when he affirmed (Jn. 1:18) that “the only Son, who is all that God is and who resides eis ton kolpon tou patros – he has revealed him”? The imagery (kolpos, “bosom”) suggests the exclusive and privileged intimacy of a deeply affectionate inter-personal relationship, but what is the import of eis? Some give the prep. a dynamic sense, noting that it normally denotes not simply orientation or direction but “movement towards or into”. I. de la Potterie, for example, renders the whole phrase “turned towards the Father’s bosom”, and finds two theological truths expressed: a personal distinction between Father and Son; “the constant orientation of the Son towards the bosom of the Father as towards his origin (eis, not pros), as towards the source of his own life (eis ton kolpon)” (“L’emploi dynamique de eis dans Saint Jean et ses incidences théologiques”, Bib. 43, 1962, 366–387; quotation from page 386). For de la Potterie it is not simply a matter of “filiation” (as in Jn. 1:1b and 1 Jn. 1:1), but of “eternal generation” (cf. $\bar{\omega}\nu$ and Jn. 6:57) (op. cit., 385), “the eternal act of receiving divine life from the Father” (op. cit., 386). But the idea of eternal generation would comport better with the preps. para (cf. Jn. 6:46) or ek (cf. the reading ek tou kolpou reflected in syr^o). If any element of movement is implied in eis, its direction is in effect reversed, on this view. Other scholars have seen eis as both static and dynamic in sense. In 1880, before the influence of the papyri finds had been felt, B. F. Westcott wrote: “There is the combination (as it were) of rest and motion, of a continuous relation, with a realisation of it (comp. i. 1, en pros). The ‘bosom of the Father’ (like heaven) is a state and not a place” (The Gospel According to St. John, 1958 ed., 15, a thought developed still further by E. A. Abbott, Johannine Grammar, 1906, §§ 2706, 2712). Now, however, the view that prevails among grammarians (e.g., A. N. Jannaris, An Historical Greek Grammar, 1897, § 1548; Funk, §§ 205, 218; F. M. Abel, Grammaire du Grec Biblique, 1927, § 47 (a)), lexicographers (e.g., Arndt, 229 s.v. eis 9a; Moulton-Milligan, xiv; A. Oepke, eis, TDNT II 433) and commentators (e.g., W. Bauer, M. Lagrange, R. Bultmann, E. C. Hoskyns, R. Schnackenburg, C. K. Barrett) is that eis ton kolpon is equivalent to en tō kolpō (Jn. 13:23).

But few scholars are content to affirm that the phrase denotes simply the personal juxtaposition of Son and Father. For G. B. Winer, the phrase indicates that the Son “is laid upon” or “rests against” the bosom of the Father, which would imply personal intercommunion (A Grammar of the Idiom of the New Testament, ET 1872, 415 and n. 1). Some of the Greek Fathers, giving eis a static sense, believed that the verse described the consubstantiality of the Father and Son. Chrysostom, for example, speaks of the Son’s dwelling in the Father’s bosom as involving “affinity of essence”: “the Father would not have in his bosom one of another essence” (Homilies on the Gospel of St. John, XV). Again, some find in eis a hint of the suppression of a preceding idea of movement (see, e.g., T. Zahn, Das Evangelium des Johannes, 1908², 96; cf. Liddell-Scott, 491, s.v. eis, I. 2). But the difficulty with the suggestion that eis implies an earlier entrance into the Father’s bosom (J. H. Greenlee, “The Preposition EIS in the New Testament”, Bible Translator 3, 1952, 13) or points to the Son’s return to his pre-incarnate state through the Ascension (H. A. W. Meyer, The Gospel According to St. John, ET 1885, 70), is that the preceding ho ōn depicts a supra-temporal condition that had no beginning. In the case of Jn. 1:18 the real choice is not between eis = eternal generation and eis = en = consubstantiality, but more generally between the static and dynamic senses of eis. While in Jn. 1:1 pros ton theon may point to an active relation of the Logos with God, in 1:18 eis ton kolpon tou patros seems to stand for the passive notion en tō kolpō tou patros (cf. Jn. 13:23). The difference between the two verses is that between pros with the accusative of the person (theos) and eis with the accusative of the thing (kolpos), a distinction generally observed in NT Gk. Any notion of dynamic interpersonal relationship found in v. 18 stems from the nouns kolpos and patēr, not from the prep. eis.

To sum up. In any discussion of the inter-relation of eis and en in NT Gk., two dangers are to be avoided: to treat them as everywhere synonymous; always to insist on a distinction between them. Of the NT writers, only Matthew seems never to confuse eis and local en (notwithstanding Matt. 28:19 – on which see below, III. A. 3. (c)). Elsewhere, the exegete’s presumption ought to be that, except for Luke (in the Third Gospel and Acts) and perhaps Mark, NT authors do not ordinarily use eis for en.

2. Telic and Ecbatic eis. No one has ever questioned that eis can express metaphorical direction, i.e. goal or purpose (final or telic eis). A celebrated example is the eis auton of Col. 1:16 (wrongly rendered in ipso in the Vulgate) which indicates that as well as being the efficient cause (di’ autou) of creation, Christ is its ultimate goal. Just as there is creatorial coherence in the sustaining power of Christ (ta panta en autō synestēken, Col. 1:17b; cf. Heb. 1:3), so there is a teleological convergence of reality on Christ. Then eis can mark the divine appointment (tassō, tithēmi) of believers to eternal life (Acts 13:48), or of unbelievers to “stumbling” over the Stone because of their deliberate rejection of the message (1 Pet. 2:8; “they who do not believe, stumble; they who stumble are also appointed for stumbling”, J. A. Bengel, Gnomon of the New Testament, ET 1863, V, 55). Whatever construction we put on the notoriously difficult skeuē orgēs katērtismena eis apōleian in Rom. 9:22 (“the objects of his wrath, fit only for destruction”), it must be noted that (i) katērtismena should be distinguished from *ha prohetoimase*n (Rom. 9:23); and (ii) God would hardly be said to have “tolerated most patiently” a situation that he himself had ordained.

But whether eis ever expresses a purpose that is actually realized (consecutive or ecbatic eis), as opposed to a result that is simply aimed at, has been an issue hotly debated by grammarians and commentators. That eis sometimes expresses result (cf. the occasional ecbatic use of hina) seems now to be generally recognized (see, e.g., C. F. D. Moule, Idiom-Book, 70; A. Oepke, eis, TDNT II 429–431). In a thorough article that deals with “The Articular Infinitive with eis” in both cl. and Hel. Gk. (JBL 15, 1896, 155–167), I. T. Beckwith concludes that in 8 NT passages (viz., Rom. 1:20; 7:5; 12:2; 2 Cor. 8:6; Gal. 3:17; Phil. 1:10; Heb. 11:3; Jas. 3:3) a consecutive sense for eis with the articular infinitive is highly probable. Oepke (op. cit.) gives further examples, in which ecbatic eis is followed by articular or anarthrous substantives (e.g., 1 Cor. 11:17; 2 Cor. 7:9 f.). In Rom. 10:10 eis dikaiosynēn means “[for with his heart a man believes] and so is justified”, although earlier (v. 4) the same phrase may bear a telic sense “[Christ is the end of the law] viewed as a means of gaining righteousness”. (Compare a similar alternation of senses for eis to with the infinitive in Rom. 4:11, 16, 18.) Finally, if the consecutive sense of eis is recognized in Rom. 12:2, Paul’s point is not that the aim of the transformation of character is the discernment of God’s will (= telic eis), but rather that the Christian’s ability to ascertain (“determine by scrutiny”; cf. Lk. 12:56) God’s will naturally results from the renewal of the mind (cf. ecbatic eis with verbs denoting renewal in Col. 3:10; Heb. 6:6). Often, however, the categories of purpose and result merge, for a result may be a designed consequence. Therefore it is sometimes impossible to determine which is intended (e.g., in the phrase eis doxan theou in 2 Cor. 4:15; Phil. 1:11; 2:11; but in 1 Cor. 10:31 it is undoubtedly telic), especially when a divine action is spoken of (e.g., eis hen sōma ebaptisthēmen, 1 Cor. 12:13).

3. Causal eis? Can eis be retrospective, giving the cause, as well as prospective, defining the purpose or result? Such a sense for eis seems unlikely in any one of the passages sometimes adduced (see, e.g., J. R. Mantey, “The Causal Use of Eis in the New Testament”, JBL 70, 1951, 45–48): Mk. 15:34 (and Matt. 14:31, “why?”); Matt. 3:11 (see below, III. A. 3. (a)); 10:41 (eis onoma prophētou, “within the category ‘prophet’” = “because he is a prophet” – Arndt 577, s.v. onoma II; cf. M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, § 106); 12:41 (= Lk. 11:32; “at the preaching of Jonah”); Acts 2:38 (see below, III. A. 3. (a)); 7:53 (“as delivered by angels,” RSV); Rom. 4:20 (“looking to the promise of God”); 11:32 (“consigned to disobedience”; cf. Ps. 77:62, LXX); 2 Tim. 2:25 (“repentance that leads to a knowledge of the truth”); 2:26 (“entrapped by him to do his will”, Weymouth); Tit. 3:14 (“to supply the necessities”); Heb. 12:7 (“it is for the benefits of discipline [or, as a discipline] that you have to endure”); 1 Jn. 5:10 (“he has refused to believe the testimony”). Liddell-Scott list no causal uses of eis.

4. logizesthai eis. This phrase, which in the LXX renders hāšab l’, occurs in the quotation of Gen. 15:6 found in Rom. 4:3 (cf. vv. 9, 22); Gal. 3:6; Jas. 2:23:

“Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness (elogisthē autō eis dikaïosynēn).” With regard to Pauline usage, the verse has been interpreted in several ways: (a) Righteousness was reckoned to the account of (= imputed to) Abraham on the basis of his faith (cf. 1 Macc. 2:52 A; Rom. 9:30; 10:6; Heb. 11:7) (see the discussion of J. Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, NLC, 1959, I, 127–139, 336–362, especially 343, 359, where it is argued that the “correlativity” [not the equation] of faith and righteousness permitted Paul to say that “faith was reckoned to Abraham as righteousness”, Rom. 4:9). (b) Abraham’s faith was reckoned as a substitute for (law-)righteousness (H. Cremer, Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek, ET 1895, 399). (c) Abraham’s faith in God was equivalent to righteousness, i.e. it was in itself the ground of his acceptability (see the comprehensive discussion in J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul, 1972, 43, 172–185, 195 f.; and cf. H. W. Heidland, logizomai, TDNT IV 289–292).

On the use of eis with baptizō, see below III. A. 3; with pisteuō, III. B. 2. (g) and 3.

E. ek

1. Its Basic Signification. Originally ek signified an exit “from within” something with which there had earlier been a close connexion. Therefore it naturally came to be used to denote origin, source, derivation or separation. So, for example, the prep. is used of the material out of which something is made (Matt. 27:29), the country of one’s origin (Acts 23:34) or a person with whom a connexion is (to be) severed (Jn. 17:15). Having this root sense, ek is sometimes equivalent to the subjective genitive (e.g., 2 Cor. 8:7 v.l.). However in the stereotyped ho ek or hoi ek before a noun (e.g., hoi ek nomou, “nomists” or “partisans of the law”, Rom. 4:14; hoi ek pisteōs, “men of faith”, Gal. 3:7, 9) the notion of belonging is more prominent than that of origin. The ubiquitous ek (tou) theou depicts: (i) the agency of God in effecting spiritual regeneration (Jn. 1:13; 1 Jn. 3:9 bis; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18a; cf. Jn. 8:47 bis; 1 Jn. 4:4, 6; 5:19; 3 Jn. 11), corresponding to the rôle of the male in the act of physical procreation (cf. Matt. 1:18) (cf. Arndt, 234 s.v. ek 3a); (ii) God as the authoritative source of Jesus’ teaching (Jn. 7:17), the giver of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:12a) and of spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 7:7), the source of all life, both physical (1 Cor. 11:12b) and spiritual (2 Cor. 5:18), the one who empowered Paul to carry out his divine commission (2 Cor. 3:5b), the architect of the resurrection body of believers (2 Cor. 5:1), the one who provides a new and right relationship with himself (Phil. 3:9), and the one true source of love (1 Jn. 4:7).

On the relation of ek to apo see above II. B. 1.

2. Some Notable Instances of ek.

(a) Jn. 15:19 bis; 17:14, 16. Parallel to the Pauline antithesis between living en sarki and yet not acting kata sarka (e.g., 2 Cor. 10:3) is the Johannine contrast between living en tō kosmō (Jn. 17:11; cf. 17:15) yet not being ek tou kosmou (Jn. 15:19 bis; 17:14b, 16a; cf. 18:36 bis). Christians must live in the world (or flesh) but must not display the characteristics of the world (or flesh) (cf. Ep. Diog. 6, 3).

(b) Rom. 1:3 f. These two verses refer to two successive stages of Christ’s existence, not to two coexisting states (kata sarka . . . kata pneuma hagiōsynēs). With respect to human descent (kata sarka; cf. Rom. 9:5) Jesus Christ was born of David’s stock (ek spermatis David). On the other hand, his installation as Son of God in power, accomplished by the power of the Holy Spirit (kata pneuma hagiōsynēs; cf. Gal. 4:29), took its rise, temporally and instrumentally (or, causally), in his resurrection from the dead (ex anastaseōs nekrōn). Not only “from the time of” the resurrection but also “through” (or, “as a result of”) the resurrection itself, Jesus was visibly designated Son of God. (For ek as introducing the means used to achieve a definite purpose [“through”] or the reason which forms a presupposition for something [“as a result of”], see Arndt, 234, s.v. ek 3 f.) In the crucial phrase ex anastaseōs nekrōn (“the resurrection of the dead”), the primary allusion in this context must be to Christ’s own resurrection from the dead, but the absence of ek before nekrōn (cf. 1 Pet. 1:3) and the use of the plural nekrōn suggest that Paul envisaged the resurrection of all believers as ideally achieved in the resurrection of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 15:20, 23; Col. 1:18). The general, inclusive category, “the resurrection of the dead,” includes the first determinative instance, “his resurrection from the dead.” For a full discussion see C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I 1975⁶, 57–64.

(c) Rom. 1:17. A myriad of proposals have been made in regard to the meaning of the phrase ek pisteōs eis pistin, such as: from the faith of the preacher to the faith of the hearer; from God’s faithfulness to man’s faith; from smaller to greater degree of faith (cf. apo doxēs eis doxan, 2 Cor. 3:18); from faith as a starting-point to faith as a permanent condition. But it seems more natural to construe ek as indicating not the source or starting-point (“from faith”) but the basis or means (“by faith”; as in Hab. 2:4), with the eis pistin either intensifying the effect of ek pisteōs (thus, “by faith from first to last”, New International Version), or denoting the goal of God’s impartation to men of a righteous status (“leading to faith”). On either of these latter views, faith is portrayed as the vital and perpetual characteristic of Christian experience.

(d) Rom. 3:30. On the basis of the difference between ek pisteōs and dia tēs pisteōs, it has been maintained that: (i) while the Jew is justified by faith (as “the moving cause”, ek pisteōs) through the channel of circumcision (supplying dia peritomēs; cf. Rom. 4:12), the Gentile is justified by faith as both “moving cause” (ek pisteōs) and “sole condition” or channel (dia tēs pisteōs) (W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam, The Epistle to the Romans, 1902⁵, 95, 96; this view highlights the contrast between peritomēn and akrobystian); (ii) Jews were to be justified by a subjective belief in the messiah, “by starting from and developing their existing faith in a coming messiah”, whereas Gentiles would be justified through the instrumentality of that developed and objective Faith of Christendom, about which they as yet knew nothing (H. P. Liddon, Explanatory Analysis of St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans, 1977 reprint of 1899 work, 79, 80); (iii) God will justify the Jews as a result of their own faith, but Gentiles by means of the faith of the Jews (tēs being an anaphoric article) as in Rom. 11:15 (N. Turner, Insights, 107–110).

If any distinction is intended between these two prep. phrases, it is formal not substantial: God justifies the Jew as a result of his faith (ek pisteōs), and the Gentile on the same ground, viz. by means of that same kind of faith (dia tēs pisteōs). Against there being any substantial difference between the justification of Jew and Gentile, several points may be urged. (i) Both prep. phrases (ek pisteōs and dia [tēs] pisteōs) may mean “through faith” or “by faith”, since both preps. may express either the effective means or the efficient cause (see Arndt, 178, s.v. dia III. 1. a, d; 234, s.v. ek 3. e, f). (ii) Elsewhere Paul uses either ek or dia to denote the immediate means or cause of justification or salvation (ek – Rom. 1:17 bis; 3:26; 5:1; 9:30, 32; Gal. 2:16; dia – Rom. 3:22, 25; Gal. 2:16; 3:26; Eph. 2:8). (iii) There is a comparable change from dia pisteōs to ek pisteōs in Rom. 3:25 f. and in Gal. 2:16 (in reference to anthrōpos). (iv) In Gal. 3:26 the Jews and Gentiles of the Galatian churches (pantes; cf. Gal. 3:28) are said to be sons of God dia tēs pisteōs; similarly Rom. 3:22, 25. (v) Any suggestion that there are two distinct means or grounds of justification (mentioned in Rom. 3:30) would tend to undermine Paul’s earlier insistence that there is no difference between Jew and Gentile with respect to sinfulness (Rom. 3:22 f.) or the ultimate ground (= grace) and means (= redemption) of justification (Rom. 3:24). (vi) Stylistic or rhetorical variation is not untypical of Paul (e.g., Rom. 4:11; 10:17).

(e) 2 Cor. 13:4. Without the wider context of 2 Cor. 10–13, one would be tempted to render estaurōthē ex astheneias, “he was crucified in (a condition of physical) weakness”, but ek probably bears a causal sense “because of (his weakness)” (thus Arndt, 234 s.v. ek 3 f.). The weakness referred to it not physical or moral, but the “weakness” – in men’s eyes – of non-retaliation or non-aggressiveness (cf. 2 Cor. 10:1 f., 10 f.; 11:20 f., 30; 12:9 f.; 13:4b, 9 f.), the “weakness” of obedience to God’s will, which, for Christ, involved death on a cross (Phil. 2:8). But in such weakness, divine power comes to its full strength (2 Cor. 12:9).

F. en

1. Its Extended NT Use. This is the most popular prep. in the NT (some 2,698 uses). N. Turner isolates three factors that contributed to its extended NT use: (a) the increasing imprecision of the dat.; (b) LXX usage, where en generally rendered the diversified b^e (see above, I. B. 2 (a)); (c) the influence of distinctively Christian ideas, such as en Christō, en pneumatī (Moulton, Grammar, III, 261).

2. Its Versatility and Ultimate Disappearance. All the more remarkable, therefore, is the fact that in modern demotic Gk. the prep. is no longer used. The ultimate disappearance of en from the spoken language is related to two facts: (a) the disappearance of the dat. case, a process completed by the tenth century; (b) the extremely diversified use of en in Hel. Gk. Commenting on this latter point, P. F. Regard notes that in the case of the infin. also there was an extension of usage simultaneously with signs of its ultimate eclipse; the more a particular linguistic form is employed, the more it is subject to weakening (Prépositions, 323 f.). In its diversification (note the 20 uses of en, with various senses, in one sentence in 2 Cor. 6:3–7a), en encroached on the territory of eis (in being employed with verbs expressing motion – e.g., Lk. 23:53; 2 Cor. 8:16), dia with the acc. (in expressing the ground – e.g., Matt. 6:7), dia with the gen. (in expressing instrumentality or agency – e.g., Lk. 22:49; Matt. 9:34), meta or dia with the gen. (in denoting attendant circumstances – e.g., Col. 2:7c; 4:2c); syn (in expressing accompaniment – e.g., Lk. 14:31), and even kata (in indicating a standard of judgment – e.g., Eph. 4:16, see Weymouth). It is not that the distinction between en and any other prep. was obliterated, but the area and frequency of overlap in usage became greater in Hel. and especially biblical Gk. than it had been earlier. Each potential example of such overlapping needs to be carefully weighed. For example, in Jas. 5:3 we should render en eschatais hēmerais “(you have piled up wealth) in the last days” rather than “for the last days (as if en = eis),” given the fact that James does not confuse eis and en and the NT conviction that with the coming of Jesus the “last days” had dawned (Acts 2:16 f.; 2 Tim. 3:1; Heb. 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:20). On the relation of en to eis see above II.D. 1. (b).

3. Exegetical Ambiguities. A corollary of the versatility of en is the exegetical ambiguity that often attaches to its use. For instance, does the phrase panta en pasin in 1 Cor. 15:28 (cf. Eph. 1:23; Col. 3:11) mean that, at the end, God will be “all in all” (KJV) (denoting his unchallenged supremacy in the universe) or “everything to (= in the case of) everyone” (Moffatt, RSV) (denoting his indwelling of all members of the redeemed community)? Sometimes all the exegete can do is to reduce the number of possible meanings of en by examining the context. But even when it proves impossible to eradicate all ambiguity, a prep. phrase may be of crucial import. en de eirenē (1 Cor. 7:15), which is emphatic by position, may well be the key to the proper understanding of this difficult passage. The reason (de, “for” RSV) a Christian partner in a mixed marriage is not bound to persist in seeking a reconciliation (when the non-Christian partner has initiated a separation) is the fact that God has called Christians (i) into a state of peace in which they should now live (pregnant or proleptic en; cf. 1 Thess. 4:7) or (ii) in the sphere of (Christian) peace (locatival en). To cause wrangling and discord is inappropriate for those with such a calling.

4. Figurative Sense. The basic figurative sense of en corresponds to its original local signification. It is used to denote the sphere within which some action occurs or the element or reality in which something is contained or consists. Phrases such as en kyriō, en pneumatī, en heni sōmati, en pistei and en alētheia indicate states in which Christians live and act. In Col. 3:20 children’s obedience to their parents is said to be pleasing (to God) en kyriō, that is, provided it arises from Christian motives. Similarly, the Christian widow is free to remarry, says Paul (1 Cor. 7:39), but only “in the (sphere of the) Lord”, that is, she may marry only a fellow-Christian (see Arndt, 259, s.v. en I. 5. d). Again, it was en iō Iēsou, “in the case of Jesus”, that is, by appealing to the fact and precedent of Jesus’ resurrection, that the apostles Peter and John established the general idea of resurrection from the dead (Acts 4:2). NT writers never argue from a general resurrection of all men to the resurrection of Jesus or of believers. “Those who belong to Christ” will be made alive “at his coming”, but only because Christ is the firstfruits, the pledge of the full harvest (1 Cor. 15:22 f.). A final example of this basic locatival sense of en may be found in Gal. 1:16, where Paul is describing how he received his gospel. en emoi means “(with)in me”, “in (the sphere of) my soul”, not “through me” (which would more commonly be di’ emou), since (a) a personal revelation is to be distinguished from a public proclamation; (b) the revelation was visual as well as verbal (Acts 9:17, 27; 22:14; 26:16, 19; 2 Cor. 4:4); (c) it is the following statement of purpose – hina euangelizōmai – that points to Paul’s agency in proclaiming the revelation he had received. (See further E. de W. Burton, The Epistle to the Galatians, ICC, 1921, 49–51.) By en emoi Paul is stressing the inward and intensely personal character of God’s revelation to him of the risen Jesus. But it is not impossible that the phrase could mean “to me” (thus RSV), involving a pleonastic en (cf. 1 Cor. 14:11), a confusion of en and eis, a proleptic en (cf. Lk. 23:19), or the influence of the en tois ethnesin that follows.

5. Causal en. Of considerable importance for theology is “causal en” (usually regarded as a sub-division of “instrumental en”). After citing several LXX passages (Deut. 24:16; 2 Sam. 3:27; Pss. 6:8; 30:11; 41:10) in which en = b^e = “on account of”, “because of”, H. A. A. Kennedy adduces comparable examples from the Pauline epistles (Rom. 1:21, 24; 5:3; 1 Cor. 4:4; 7:14; 2 Cor. 12:5, 9; Phil. 1:13) (“Two Exegetical Notes on St. Paul. I. A Special Use of en”, ExpT 28, 1916–17, 322 f.). To these might be added Matt. 6:7; Jn. 16:30; Acts 7:29; 24:16; Rom. 14:21; Col. 1:21. For instances from the papyri, see C. Rossberg, De . . . Usu, 1909, 29 and Moulton-Milligan, 210.

6. en Christō. In the many uses of this common Pauline formula, the en has no uniform function but seems to express the following range of ideas or relationships. A paraphrase will bring out the import of the expression in the examples cited.

(a) Incorporative union: “So that, incorporate in the person of Christ, we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21). “There is therefore now no penal servitude for those who are in union with Christ Jesus” (Rom. 8:1). “Consequently, if anyone is united to Christ, there is a new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17).

(b) Sphere of reference: “I know a Christian man” (2 Cor. 12:2). “We make our boast in the sphere of Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3:3). “They were Christians before I was” (Rom. 16:7).

(c) Agency or instrumentality: “They are justified freely by his grace through the redemption accomplished by Christ Jesus” (Rom. 3:24). “The veil is not lifted because only through Christ is it removed” (2 Cor. 3:14).

(d) Cause: “You have come to completeness as a result of being in him (Christ)” (Col. 2:10). “All will be made alive by virtue of their connexion and solidarity with Christ” (1 Cor. 15:22).

(e) Mode: “You are all one by being in Christ Jesus” (Gal. 3:28).

(f) Location: “The love of God that is focused in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 8:39). “Have this attitude among you that also characterized Christ Jesus” (Phil. 2:5).

(g) Authoritative basis: “We urge you on the authority of the Lord Jesus” (1 Thess. 4:1).

For the immense literature on the subject, see E. Best, One Body in Christ, 1955, 8–19. If the concept that lies behind Paul’s en Christō formula is that of Christ as a universal personality (A. Oepke, en, TDNT II 542), an inclusive personality (C. F. D. Moule, “The Corporate Christ” in his The Phenomenon of the New Testament, SBT, Second Series 1, 1967, 26), or a corporate personality (E. Best, op. cit. 29), so that believers as a corporate whole dwell “in Christ,” in the complementary expression, “Christ (Jesus) in you” (en hymin) (Rom. 8:10; 2 Cor. 13:5; Col. 1:27; cf. Gal. 2:20), the notion of a direct relation between two individuals is more pronounced. Only in Johannine thought is there the idea of personal co-inherence (Jn. 6:56; 14:20; 15:4 f.; 1 Jn. 3:24; 4:13, 15 f.), patterned on the archetype of divine co-inherence (Jn. 10:38; 14:10 f., 20; 17:21, 23). It is also noteworthy that Paul more often depicts Christians as being en Christō and the Spirit as en hymin than Christ as en hymin and Christians as en pneumatī. On the relationship between the expressions en Christō and en pneumatī in Paul, see F. Prat, The Theology of Saint Paul, II, ET 1945, 394 f.; F. Neugebauer, “Das Paulinische ‘In Christō’”, NTS 4, 1957–8, 124–138; H. F. Woodhouse, “Life in Christ and Life in the Spirit”, Anglican Theological Review 47, 1965, 289–293.

2 Cor. 5:19a may be translated in two basic ways: “that through Christ (en Christō) God was reconciling the world to himself” or “that God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself.” Nothing in the immediate context demands that either of these renderings be excluded as inappropriate, and each embodies a typically Pauline sentiment. What makes the second translation preferable are the following considerations: (i) it would be awkward for the two elements of a periphrastic (imperfect) construction (ēn . . . katallassōn) to be separated by three words (cf. Gal. 1:22 f.; Phil. 2:26; Tit. 3:3 is no real parallel); (ii) elsewhere when Paul uses the verb katallassein and specifies Christ as God’s agent in effecting reconciliation, the dia phrase employed to express the latter idea either precedes (as in Col. 1:20; cf. Rom. 5:11) or follows (as in Rom. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:18; cf. Col. 1:22) the fixed order: verb (katallassein) – object(s) of reconciliation – goal of reconciliation. This might lead us to expect, if en Christō in 2 Cor. 5:19 specified agency and ēn . . . katallassōn were a periphrastic imperfect, that the en Christō would precede the theos or follow the heautō (although, on any view, kosmon is not in its normal position). The finite verb (ēn) and the participle (katallassōn) are perhaps related as expressing something akin to cause and effect: it was only because God in all his fullness had chosen to dwell in Christ (Col. 1:19), only because there dwelt embodied in Christ the total plenitude of Deity (Col. 2:9), that reconciliation was accomplished. A functional christology presupposes, and finds its ultimate basis in, an ontological christology. Not only was Christ God’s agent in effecting reconciliation (Rom. 5:10 f.; 2 Cor. 5:18; Col. 1:19–22); he also mediated the divine presence, thus giving validity to his reconciliatory sacrifice. God was in Christ and therefore acted through Christ (cf. Jn. 14:10b, “the Father who dwells in me does his works”). Paul here alludes to Christ as the locus of divine revelation (“God was in Christ”) and therefore as the means of divine redemption (“reconciling the world to himself”; cf. 2 Cor. 5:18). There is also established an identity between the redemptive action of God and that of Christ. Ubi Christus, ibi Deus: where Christ is, there is God.

G. epi

1. Its Basic Meaning and Versatility. Basically denoting position on something which forms a support or foundation, epi is the opposite of hypo (“under”) and differs from hyper (“above”) in implying actual rest upon some object. In this primary local sense of “on”, “upon”, epi is followed by the acc., the gen. or the dat., often without distinction in meaning (e.g., with kathēmenos and thronos, Rev. 4:2 acc., 4:9 f. gen., 21:5 dat.; see also Matt. 25:21). epi, the one NT prep. used frequently with three cases (acc. 464 times, gen. 216, dat. 176 – Moulton, Grammar, I, 107), has a versatility of use that is matched only by en. From the simple spatial meaning of epi there naturally developed a multitude of derived senses, so that the prep. may express, inter alia: addition (Lk. 3:20; 2 Cor. 7:13; Col. 3:14); superintendence (Matt. 2:22; Lk. 12:44; Rom. 9:5); cause or basis (Matt. 4:4; Lk. 5:5; Acts 3:16; 1 Tim. 5:19); circumstance (Rom. 8:20; 1 Cor. 9:10; Tit. 1:2); and purpose or destination (Gal. 5:13, “you were called to freedom”, ep’ eleutheria, a statement that epitomizes the argument of this epistle, “the charter of Christian liberty”; Eph. 2:10, “created . . . for doing good deeds”; 1 Thess. 4:7). Of special interest is the use of epi (with the acc.) to denote the recipients of various spiritual blessings or experiences, such as a trance (Acts 10:10), the word of God (Lk. 3:2), the kingdom of God (Matt.

12:28; Lk. 10:9), the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:17 f.; 10:45; Tit. 3:6; 1 Pet. 4:14), the power of Christ (2 Cor. 12:9), or the grace of God (Lk. 2:40).

2. Some Notable Uses of epi.

(a) epi to auto. In the LXX (e.g., 2 Sam. 2:13; Pss. 2:2; 33:4) the meaning of this prep. phrase is “together” or “at the same place”, while in the papyri it is frequent in the sense “in all” (denoting the sum total of an account) (E. Mayser, Grammatik, II, 2, 418 n. 2). The phrase has the sense of “together” in Acts 4:26 (quoting Ps. 2:2) and in Matt. 22:34; Lk. 17:35. As a euphemism for sexual intercourse, epi to auto einai occurs in 1 Cor. 7:5. Adducing illuminating parallels from the Qumran Manual of Discipline (e.g., 1QS 5:7), M. Wilcox has shown that in Acts 2:47 (as in 1:15; 2:44, 46D) the phrase is not a mistranslation of the Aram. lahdā' (as C. C. Torrey maintained – see Moulton, Grammar, II, 473) but a quasi-technical expression denoting the union of the Christian fellowship: “the Lord was day by day incorporating into the Fellowship those who were being saved” (The Semitisms of Acts, 1965, 93–100). That epi to auto and en ekklēsia are sometimes virtually synonymous, signifying “in church fellowship”, seems evident from the parallelism of 1 Cor. 11:18 and 11:20. This meaning, common in the Apostolic Fathers (e.g., 1 Clem. 34:7; Ign. Eph. 5:3; 13:1; Mag. 7:1; Phil. 6:2; 10:1; Barn. 4:10 – cited by E. Ferguson, “‘When You Come Together’: Epi to Auto in Early Christian Literature”, Restoration Quarterly 16, 1973, 205 f.), should be given to the phrase in Acts 2:1, 44 v.l., 46D, 47; 1 Cor. 11:20; 14:23 and possibly Acts 1:15. The “togetherness” of the early Christians was expressed principally in their meeting for public worship “in church fellowship” or “in the assembly”.

(b) epi' hō. The innumerable interpretations of Rom. 5:12 fall into two main grammatical categories: those that construe hō as a relative pronoun (whose antecedent may be either ho thanatos, “death”, or henos anthrōpou, “one man”), with epi meaning “in” or “because of”; and those that treat epi' hō as a conjunction, equivalent to epi toutō hoti, “on the ground of this fact, that”, “because.” The former alternatives must be pronounced improbable since elsewhere in Paul (viz., 2 Cor. 5:4; Phil. 3:1; 4:10) epi' hō is conjunctive, whatever its precise nuance. The focus of exegetical attention therefore naturally moves to pantes hēmarton, which may refer to man’s corporate involvement in the transgression of Adam or to men’s personal sin in imitation of Adam or as a result of inheriting a corrupt Adamic nature. Then, since some nexus between Adam and his descendants with regard to sin seems demanded by Paul’s Adam-Christ analogy (see Rom. 5:18 f.; cf. 1 Cor. 15:22), the most likely options seem to be: (i) “death spread to all men because all sinned” (either actually in Adam’s primal transgression or in their federal representative, Adam) (hēmarton being a constative aorist); (ii) “death spread to all men because all (since the time of Adam) have sinned” (hēmarton a constative aorist), or “. . . do sin” (hēmarton a gnomic aorist) (as those who have inherited Adam’s nature). See further the discussions of S. Lyonnet, “Le sens de epi' hō en Rom. 5:12 et l’exégèse des Pères grecs”, Bib 36, 1955, 436–456; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I 1975⁶, 274–281; and S. L. Johnson, Jr., “Romans 5:12 – An Exercise in Exegesis and Theology”, in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, ed. R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney, 1974, 298–316.

As for 2 Cor. 5:4 the vast majority of commentators agree that a causal sense should be given to epi' hō. The only viable alternative, viz. epi' ho = “on condition that” (proposed by M. E. Thrall, Greek Particles in the New Testament, 1962, 94). labours under a twofold difficulty: it demands the insertion of a complex parenthesis before the prep. phrase to complete the sense, “(but such sighing is permissible only on condition that”); and it overlooks the parallelism between 5:2, “we groan because we long to put on over it (ependysasthai epipothountes) (viz. our earthly tent-dwelling) our heavenly habitation”, and 5:4, “we groan with a sense of oppression because, so far from wishing to become disembodied, we desire to put on (our heavenly dwelling)” (thelomen . . . ependysasthai). The origin of Paul’s groaning or sighing (stenazomen, 5:2, 4), that is, his sense of frustration under the limitations of a sarx-dominated sōma, is not to be located in a Hellenistic depreciation of corporeality but in his yearning (epipothountes, 5:2) or wish (thelomen, 5:4) for “super-investiture” (ependysasthai, 5:2, 4), for the acquisition of a spiritual body (cf. 1 Cor. 15:44). And if Paul “groaned” in physical embodiment because he longed for spiritual corporeality, that longing arose because God had given him the Spirit as the pledge of the resurrection transformation (5:4b, 5).

(c) Matt. 19:9. In itself the crucial phrase mē epi porneia (lit. “not on the basis of immorality”) in this famous Matthean divorce-saying could conceivably be interpreted as parenthetical, providing a negative explanatory refinement: “it is also not allowed on the ground of fornication” (A. Ott, Die Auslegung der neutestamentlichen Texte über die Ehescheidung, 1911, 299, cited by F. Hauck and S. Schulz, pornē, TDNT VI 592 n. 75), “not [even] for immorality [can he divorce her]”. But in light of the unambiguous parallel in Matt. 5:32, parektos logou porneias, “except for [the reason of] immorality” (cf. Arndt, 479 s.v. logos 2. d), the mē of Matt. 19:9 should be treated as equivalent to ei mē, introducing an exception, “except on the basis of immorality” (cf. Arndt, 287 s.v. epi II. b. gamma), “except for immorality”. The difference between the two Matthean phrases (viz. parektos logou porneias and mē epi porneia) is formal rather than substantial. To treat mē epi as meaning “not in addition to” yields no satisfactory sense in the context. Many identifications have been proposed for the porneia (here listed in descending order of probability): (i) adultery (cf. Sir. 23:23); (ii) marriage (entered in good faith) within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity (Lev. 18:6–18; cf. Acts 15:20, 29; 1 Cor. 5:1 where incest = porneia), where porneia = Heb. z^enūt; (iii) pre-marital unchastity discovered after marriage (cf. Deut. 22:13–21); (iv) moral or spiritual adultery (since figuratively z^enūt can denote apostasy or violation of the covenant, e.g., Num. 14:33); (v) logos porneias (Matt. 5:32) = Heb. ’erwat dābār (Deut. 24:1, LXX aschēmon pragma), “some indecency”; (vi) a mixed marriage between a Jew or Christian and a pagan; (vii) prostitution. For further discussion → Separate, art. chōrizō.

(d) 1 Pet. 2:24a. Two translations of this verse may be offered: (i) “He himself bore our sins in his body on the cross”; (ii) “He himself, in his own person, carried our sins up on to the cross.” While it is true that anapherō may mean nothing more than pherō (cf. LXX Isa. 53:4 pherei, 53:12 anēnenken, both rendering Heb. nāsā) and epi with the acc. can denote location (Arndt, 288 s.v. epi III. 1. zeta), there are several reasons for preferring the second translation. (i) If 1 Pet. 2:24a is a combination of Isa. 53:12 and Deut. 21:23 (“cursed by God is everyone who hangs on a tree,” epi xylou), Peter’s change to epi to xylon is significant. (ii) It is the combination of ana- and epi with the acc. that is remarkable. A distinction should be drawn between (an)ēnenken epi tou xylou, “he bore on the cross,” and Peter’s anēnenken . . .

epi to xylon, “he carried up . . . on to the cross.” (iii) Although anapherō is a technical term describing the priest’s task of bringing a sacrifice and placing it on the altar (e.g., Lev. 14:20), here the verb does not mean “offer up in sacrifice” (as it does in Heb. 7:27; Jas. 2:21), since sins could never be conceived of as an offering to God and Peter has preferred the term xylon (“gibbet”) over thysias̄terion (“altar”); rather the verb should be understood in a non-technical sense, “carry up”. The picture is not of Christ as a priest and the cross as an altar but of Christ as the sin-bearer (cf. Jn. 1:29) and the cross as the place where sin was destroyed (cf. Col. 2:14 f.). E. G. Selwyn finds a possible allusion to Peter’s actually having seen Jesus ascend Golgotha as the sin-bearer (The First Epistle of St. Peter, 1946, 96, 181). For the view that anapherō epi is a forensic technical expression for the laying of one person’s debt upon another, see G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, ET 1901, 88–91.

On the use of epi tō onomati after baptizō, see below III. A. 5; and of epi with pisteuō, III. B. 2. (e) and (f).

H. hyper

Its original local sense of “over”, “above” (Lat. super) is found in cl. Gk. (e.g. Hdt. 2, 6, 19) and occasionally in the papyri (C. Rossberg, De . . . Usu, 40) but not in the LXX or NT. The commonest meaning this preposition bears (viz. “on behalf of”) seems to have arisen from the image of one person standing or bending over another in order to protect or shield him, or of a shield lifted over the head which suffers the blow instead of the person (cf. hyperaspizein, “cover with a shield”).

1. With the Accusative. Although ingenious efforts have been made to explain the awkward to mē hyper ha gegrap̄tai in 1 Cor. 4:6 as a scribe’s marginal gloss that crept into the text (see the survey of views in W. F. Howard, “1 Corinthians iv. 6 (Exegesis or Emendation?)”, ExpT 33, 1921–2, 479 f.), the phrase is better understood as a quotation (note the to) of a Pauline slogan (viz., “Do not go beyond what stands written”) or (conceivably) as Paul’s repudiation of a Corinthian watchword (viz., “Beyond Scripture”) (cf. M. D. Hooker, “‘Beyond the Things which are Written’: An Examination of 1 Cor. iv. 6,” NTS 10, 1963–64, 127–132).

2. With the Genitive. When the prep. expresses some advantage or favour that accrues to persons, its sense is “on behalf of” (representation) or “in the place of” (substitution). When the benefit is gained by things, the meaning will be “for the sake of”, which approaches a causal sense (“because of”).

To act on behalf of a person often involves acting in his place. Hence hyper not infrequently has the sense of anti (as in the papyri – Rossberg, De . . . Usu, 41). Thus sou allagma is parallel to hyper sou in Isa. 43:3, antallagē to lytron hyper hēmōn in Ep. Diog. 9:2, 5, and Irenaeus has hyper tōn hēmeterōn psychōn in parallelism with anti tōn hēmeterōn sarkōn (Haer. 5, 1, 2). Of Onesimus, Paul says to Philemon: “I would have been glad to keep him with me, so that he might serve me as your proxy (hyper sou) during my imprisonment for the gospel” (Phlm. 13). For the relevant phrase, Moffatt has “as your deputy”, and Goodspeed, “in your place”. Commenting on hyper hēmōn in Col. 1:7, J. B. Lightfoot observes that “as the evangelist of Colossae, Epaphras had represented St. Paul there and preached in his stead” (Saint Paul’s Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, 1900, 134). As recorded in the Fourth Gospel, Caiaphas remonstrates with the Jewish leaders: “You do not understand that it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people (hyper tou laou)” (Jn. 11:50; similarly in 18:14). It is clear that hyper here denotes substitution, not simply benefit or representation, since Caiaphas remarks that such a death “for the people” would ensure that “the whole nation” did not perish (Jn. 11:50b; laos and ethnos both refer to the (same) Jewish nation; cf. hyper tou ethnous, vv. 51 f.). That is, politically the death of the one (as a scapegoat) would be a substitute for the death of the many. As John saw it (10:41 f.; 18:14), Caiaphas had unwittingly expressed a theological profundity: Christ’s suffering was vicarious and redemptive (cf. E. A. Abbott, Johannine Grammar, 1906, 276). Very similar is the Pauline affirmation that “one died for all” (heis hyper pantōn apethanen), where, as R. Bultmann notes (Der Zweite Brief an die Korinther, 1976, 152 f.), hyper is shown to bear a substitutionary sense by the inference Paul draws: “therefore all died” (2 Cor. 5:14). The death of Christ was the death of all, because he was dying their death. In becoming the object of divine wrath against human sin, Christ was acting vicariously, viz., hyper hēmōn, not only “on our behalf” or “with a view to our good” but “in our place” (2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13). He assumed the liabilities of others in “being made sin” and “becoming a curse” (katara, “abstractum pro concreto: bearer of the curse”, H. Riesenfeld, hyper, TDNT VIII 509; see also A. T. Robertson, Grammar, 631). However, in several places where the phrase apothanein (or its equivalent) hyper occurs, it is difficult to determine whether or not the prep. denotes substitution (e.g., Rom. 8:32; Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2, 25; 1 Thess. 5:10; Tit. 2:14). In Rom. 14:15 (hyper hou, note the singular), any substitutionary notion is unlikely since a parallel in 1 Cor. 8:11 has di’ hon. It is striking that, in addition to affirming that Christ died for persons (hyper asebōn, Rom. 5:6; hyper pantōn, 2 Cor. 5:14 f., 1 Tim. 2:6; hyper hēmōn, Rom. 5:8; 1 Thess. 5:10), Paul can say that he died or gave himself hyper tōn hamartiōn hēmōn (1 Cor. 15:3; Gal. 1:4, v.l.; cf. Heb. 5:1; 7:27), “with reference to our sins”, i.e. “to deal with our sin”, “to expiate our sins”. But why does Paul never say that Christ died anti hēmōn (1 Tim. 2:6 is the nearest he comes – antilytron hyper pantōn)? Probably because the prep. hyper, unlike anti, could simultaneously express representation and substitution (similarly R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament, 1948 reprint of ninth edition, § lxxii, 310–313; E. K. Simpson, The Pastoral Epistles, 1954, 110–112, “Note on the Meaning of HYPER in Certain Contexts,” where there is an impressive assembling of evidence from cl. and Hel. Gk. to show that hyper not uncommonly denotes proxyship, “in lieu of”; but see per contra F. Prat, The Theology of Saint Paul, 1945, II, 197). It is significant that in the papyri we find that a semi-technical formula (egrapsa hyper autou agrammatou) is used to indicate that one person had written or signed a letter on behalf of and in place of another person who was illiterate (see E. Mayser, Grammatik, II, 2, 460; and A. T. Robertson, “The Use of hyper in Business Documents in the Papyri”, The Expositor 8th series 18, 1919, 321–327). We may conclude that the emphasis in hyper is on representation, in anti on substitution; yet a substitute represents and a representative may be a substitute. That is, hyper sometimes implies anti.

On the use of hyper in 1 Cor. 15:29, see below III. A. 1.

I. hypo

There are several ways in which agency is expressed in the NT: hypo (Matt. 4:1, bis), dia (2 Cor. 1:19), apo (2 Cor. 3:18), ek (Gal. 4:4) and possibly para with the gen., en with the dat. (Matt. 9:34), or the simple dat. (Matt. 6:1) (see A. T. Robertson, Grammar, 635 f., 820).

1. hypo and dia. It cannot be maintained that while dia denotes the inanimate instrument, hypo specifies the personal agent, for dia may express personal agency (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:21) and hypo may be applied to inanimate agencies (e.g., hypo tou noos, Col. 2:18), to non-human agents (e.g., hypo tōn thērion, Rev. 6:8) or to personified forces (e.g., hypo anemou, Lk. 7:24). Where the two preps. may be distinguished, dia marks intermediate agency and hypo ultimate or original agency. Thus in Matt. 1:22, the Lord as the ultimate author (hypo kyriou) of the prophetic word is distinguished from the prophet Isaiah who acted as a mediate agent (dia tou prophētou) in speaking the divine word. Compare the similar distinction between primary origin and subordinate agency in the ek (of God the Father) – dia (of Jesus Christ) contrast in 1 Cor. 8:6 with regard to creation and preservation.

2. hypo and apo. The distinction here, when it obtains, is that between immediate and active causation (hypo) and less immediate and less active causation (apo), between the direct and indirect origination of an action (cf. Arndt, 87 s.v. apo V. 6), between an internal and an external causal relation (cf. A. Buttmann, Grammar, 325), or between the efficient cause and the occasional cause (“that from which a result ensued”) (G. B. Winer, Grammar, 369). In such cases apo may be rendered “at the hands of” (e.g., Mk. 8:31; 2 Cor. 7:13), “by the will (or command) of” (e.g., Rev. 12:6) or “as a result of” (Rev. 9:18). In the expression apo theou peirazomai (Jas. 1:13a), God is viewed as the ultimate cause of temptation but not directly as the tempter. James is saying: “Let nobody say when he is tempted, ‘I am being tempted by circumstances and influences that come from God or are permitted by him.’” However the following rebuttal of this sentiment (“he himself tempts no one”, v. 13c) shows that a direct divine temptation was also in mind. (For the view that James is here re-interpreting Matt. 6:13a in a distinctively Christian sense, see N. Turner, Insights, 161–163.) But that apo occasionally stands for hypo seems incontestable (see Lk. 7:35; Acts 2:22; 15:4, 33; 20:9; 2 Cor. 7:13; cf. Thuc., History, 4, 25, 5).

3. hypo and para. There is no clear instance where para replaces hypo (but see Mk. 10:40 v.l.; Acts 10:33 v.l.; 22:30 v.l.). In Lk. 1:45 (“... what was spoken to her [Mary] para kyriou”) the prep. may allude to the intermediate agency of the angel (see M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, § 90). Whereas para traces an action back to its point of departure or source, hypo relates an action to its efficient cause (so G. B. Winer, Grammar, 365).

Observing that apo, ek, para and hypo all denote “issuing, proceeding from,” Winer ranges these four preps. in the following order with regard to the degree of intimacy of connexion between the objects in question, ek representing the most intimate and apo the most remote: ek, hypo, para, apo. Only apo and ek directly imply “disjoining” and “removal” (op. cit., 364 f.).

J. kata

1. Root Meaning. The primary, local meaning of kata seems to have been either “down (from or upon)” (expressing vertical extension) or (less probably) “along while remaining in contact with” (expressing horizontal extension). That kata is closely related to ana is clear from the fact that “down” and “up” simply represent the same idea from opposite viewpoints. Just as ana corresponds to anō, “up(wards)”, so the prep. kata answers to the adv. katō, “down(wards)”. Examples of the spatial meaning of kata (with the gen.) include Matt. 8:32; Acts 27:14 (“a tempestuous wind swept down from it” [kat’ autēs] = the island of Crete with its mountain ravines); 1 Cor. 11:4. 2 Cor. 8:2 affords a clear example of the developed metaphorical sense: “poverty reaching down to the depths” (kata bathous) = “extreme poverty.” From the local meaning, “down upon”, there naturally arose the idea of hostile movement directed against someone or something (where kata is the opposite of hyper; cf. Rom. 8:31, 33 f.) (e.g., Acts 6:13; 1 Cor. 4:6). In this regard 2 Cor. 13:8 should not be taken to mean that truth is its own defence (contrast Rom. 1:18; Jude 3) (“for we cannot do anything against the truth [kata tēs alētheias]”). Explaining why he does not expect the Corinthians to discover him to be a false apostle or counterfeit Christian, Paul is asserting that he would never be able to bring himself to propagate falsehood or to hinder the advance of the truth without first changing his identity as an apostle. In Gal. 5:17 the active mutual antagonism of two irreconcilable adversaries – the flesh and the Spirit – is expressed by the words epithymei kata: “the cravings of our old nature conflict with the Spirit, and the Spirit with our old nature.” Again, Paul speaks of God’s obliteration, through the cross of Christ, of the signed acknowledgment of indebtedness (cheirographon) “that stood against us [kath’ hēmōn] with its regulations and was directly hostile to us [hypenantion hēmin]” (Col. 2:14). The former phrase emphasizes the brute fact of indebtedness, while the latter stresses the active hostility produced by this fact; J. A. Bengel finds the distinction to be that between “a state of war and an actual engagement” (Gnomon of the New Testament, ET 1863, IV, 172).

Attention may now be given to several uses of kata that provide theologically significant statements.

2. kata sarka and kata pneuma. kata sarka sometimes means simply “with respect to (physical) descent” (Rom. 1:3; 4:1; 9:3). Appearing in the form to kata sarka, the phrase has the purpose in Rom. 9:5 either of pointing to a complementary antithesis (as if to kata pneuma stood after “God over all”) or of affirming that it is only “as far as human descent is concerned” (cf. Funk, § 266 (1)) that the messiah (= Christ) belongs to the Jewish people. Not a few commentators find in 2 Cor. 5:16b a Pauline disavowal of interest in the historical Jesus (kata sarka Christon). But kata sarka here signifies “from a worldly [or nationalistic] point of view” and qualifies egnōkamen (“we regarded”), rather than qualifying Christon with the whole phrase meaning “a physical Christ.” Since the time of his conversion Paul had ceased making superficial judgments based on external appearances (cf. 2 Cor. 5:12). Just as he now repudiated as totally erroneous his sincere yet superficial pre-conversion estimate of Jesus as a misguided messianic pretender whose followers must be extirpated (Acts 9:1 f.; 26:9–11), so he regarded the time-honoured division of mankind into Jew and Gentile (2 Cor. 5:16a) as less significant for him than the believer-unbeliever distinction (see, e.g., Rom. 2:28 f.; 10:12 f.; 1 Cor. 5:12 f.; Gal. 6:10) which was based on a kata pneuma (“in light of the Spirit”) or kata stauron (“in the light of the cross”) attitude. Two basic and profound changes had been brought about in Paul’s attitude as a result of his Damascus encounter with the risen Jesus: he now acclaimed Jesus as messiah and Lord (Acts 9:22; 17:3; Rom. 10:9);

he now viewed Gentile believers as Abraham's offspring, fellow-citizens, brothers in Christ (Gal. 3:26–29; Eph. 2:11–21) and Jewish unbelievers as needing salvation in Christ (Rom. 10:1–4). For a review of the various interpretations of 2 Cor. 5:16, see J. W. Fraser, "Paul's Knowledge of Jesus: II Corinthians v. 16 once more", NTS 17, 1970–1, 293–313.

The opposition between "flesh" and "Spirit" is an important ingredient in Pauline theology (e.g., Gal. 5:16–24); so too, then, is the contrast between kata sarka and kata pneuma. Paul can use en sarki in a neutral or non-moral sense, referring to mortal embodiment or existence (2 Cor. 10:3; Gal. 2:20), but in Rom. 7:5; 8:8 f. it is equivalent to kata sarka. The sense of Rom. 8:5 is that "those who are controlled by (or live in obedience to) their old nature" (hoi kata sarka ontes = hoi sarkikoi, cf. 1 Cor. 3:3) are earthly-minded or take the side of the flesh in the Spirit-flesh conflict (cf. Gal. 5:17); "those whose lives are directed by the Spirit" (hoi kata pneuma = hoi pneumatikoi, cf. 1 Cor. 2:15; 3:1) give their attention to spiritual matters or take the side of the Spirit. In this kata sarka – kata pneuma antithesis the contrast is between two diametrically opposed determinative principles of action, two radically different sources for the prompting of conduct. But the contrast is given another turn in Gal. 4:21–31. Here ho kata sarka gennētheis ("he who was born in the ordinary course of nature", v. 29a) refers to Ishmael as "the son of the slave" (v. 23a) and then (allegorically) to the descendants of Abraham who do not have his faith, while ho kata pneuma (gennētheis) ("who was born by the power of the Spirit", v. 29b) refers first to Isaac as "the son of the free woman in fulfilment of the promise" (v. 23b) and then to all those who share Abraham's faith as "children of promise" (v. 28).

3. kata Denoting Correspondence or Conformity. Often the noun that follows kata specifies the criterion, standard or norm in the light of which a statement is made or is true, an action is performed, or a judgment is passed. The prep. will mean "according to", "in conformity with", "corresponding to". This use is common in reference to the precise and impartial standard of judgment that will be applied at the great Assize (Matt. 16:27; Rom. 2:6; 1 Cor. 3:8; 2 Tim. 4:14; 1 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 2:23). Noteworthy too is the twice-repeated kata tas graphas ("in accordance with the Scriptures") in 1 Cor. 15:3 f., which constitutes an appeal to OT predictions of (i) the death of Christ or his death to atone for sins (Isa. 53:4–6, 10–12), and (ii) the resurrection of Christ (Ps. 16:10; Isa. 53:10b, 11a; 54:7) or his resurrection on the third day (Hos. 6:2; Lev. 23:10 f.), in confirmation of the reliability of the NT kerygma and the continuity of God's action in the two Ages. Both the death and the resurrection of Christ formed part of the age-long plan of God (cf. Acts 2:23–32; 13:34–37). kata theon may signify "in accordance with God's will" (Rom. 8:27), "in the image of God" (Eph. 4:24; cf. Col. 3:10), "as God intends" (1 Pet. 5:2), "in a godly way" (2 Cor. 7:9, 11), or simply "godly" (hē kata theon lypē, "godly sorrow," 2 Cor. 7:10). There is an interesting contrast of two kata phrases in 1 Pet. 4:6. Addressing a concern some believers evidently felt about the fate of Christian martyrs (cf. 1 Thess. 4:13–18), Peter observed that the very reason for the proclamation of the good news to such Christians who were now deceased was that, although in men's estimation (kata anthrōpous) they had been physically judged by death, they should live in a spiritual state as God does (kata theon). There is no need to insist that kata should bear an identical sense in both parts of the verse. Elsewhere (1 Pet.

3:7) Peter encourages Christian husbands to live with their wives kata gnōsin, which may mean: (i) in a considerate and tactful manner; (ii) in light of the knowledge of God's will and character; or (iii) in accordance with Christian knowledge about husband-wife relations in general and sexual relations in particular (cf. 1 Cor. 7:3–5). Sometimes the ideas of “standard” and “reason” merge: hoi kata prothesin klētoi (Rom. 8:28) indicates that God's calling is in accord with and because of his purpose (thus Arndt, 408 s.v. kata II. 5. a. delta). Or the notion of “conformity” may be totally displaced, with kata denoting the “basis.” Thus, election is based on (kata) the foreknowledge of God the Father, is effected by (en) the sanctifying work of the Spirit, and aims at or achieves (eis) obedience and the constant sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 1:1 f.). Similarly, in Peter's view, regeneration is the result of the Father's great mercy (kata to poly autou eleos, 1 Pet. 1:3a) and an act of immortal procreation (ek sporas . . . apthartou, 1 Pet. 1:23a), is achieved by means of (dia) God's living and enduring word (1 Pet. 1:23b), and results in (eis) the possession of a vibrant hope (1 Pet. 1:3b).

4. Distributive kata. The use of kat' oikon (“in the various houses”, Arndt, 407 s.v. kata II. 1. d.) affords evidence that, at least in the earliest days of the Jerusalem church, daily (kath' hēmeran; cf. Acts 6:1) celebrations of the Lord's supper (Acts 2:46) and daily (pasan hēmeran, “[throughout] every day”) teaching and preaching (Acts 5:42) took place “by households” (Moulton-Milligan, 443 s.v. oikos). And with regard to ecclesiastical polity, the phrase kat' ekklēsia (“in each individual church”, Arndt, 240 s.v. ekklēsia 4. b) implies that every Pauline church in South Galatia had a plurality of elders (“And they had appointed elders [presbyterous] for them in every church . . .”, Acts 14:23).

K. meta

See the discussion under syn below II. O. 1.

L. para

1. Its Basic Sense. This is one of the two NT preps. (the other is epi) regularly used with three cases. If its radical signification is “by the side of”, “beside”, para with the acc. (60 times in the NT) designates movement “to a position beside” (Mk. 4:4; Acts 4:35; but cf. Mk. 4:1; 10:46 where no idea of movement is implied); with the gen. (78 times), movement or procession “from beside” (Jn. 1:6; but note Lk. 6:19, where para follows a vb. compounded with ek [ex]); with the dat. (50 times), rest or position “beside” (Lk. 9:47; Jn. 8:38; 19:25, the latter being the only NT use with a thing, not a person).

2. Transferred Meanings. By transference from the local sense it bears with the gen., para with the acc. came to mean “beyond” and then “contrary to” (used of that which goes beyond specified limits). Consequently when Paul anathematized anyone who preached a gospel at variance with (para) the gospel he proclaimed and the Galatians had received (Gal. 1:8 f.), he implies that Judaistic teaching was not conforming to the apostolic norm. The opposite of para in this sense is kata (“in accordance with”). As well as expressing this notion of contrariety, para may mark a comparison by indicating that one thing lies beyond and therefore is superior to something else (e.g., Rom. 14:5, “one man approves one day in preference to another”, Moulton-Milligan, 479). Where this comparison is heightened, there is present the idea not merely of preference (“more than”) but of exclusiveness (“instead of”). One aspect of Paul’s indictment of mankind in Rom. 1:18–32 is that they worshipped and served created things instead of (para) the Creator. The apostle is not implying (as the rendering “. . . more than the Creator” might suggest) that “creature-worship” is permissible provided it does not usurp the place of “Creator-worship”. (But it is just possible that para here means “(passing) beyond” = “neglecting.”) In a similar way, Lk. 18:14 (“this man went home justified rather than [or, instead of, para] the other”) does not point to two types or degrees of justification (“. . . more than the other”), one of which was experienced by the tax collector, the other by the Pharisee; only the former was justified (see Arndt, 616 s.v. para III. 3; H. Riesenfeld, para, TDNT V 734 f.). On the relation of para to hypo, see above II. I. 3.

The phrase para (tō) theō (“in the sight [or judgment] or God”) (Rom. 2:13; 1 Cor. 3:19; 7:24 [on which see Arndt, 615 s.v. para II. 2. 3]; Jas. 1:27; 1 Pet. 2:20) or para kyriō (2 Pet. 2:11, v.l.) indicates the ultimate standard – the purity of the divine life and the clarity of the divine vision – by which all aspects of thought and conduct, whether human or angelic, should now be assessed and will in the end be judged.

3. para in the Fourth Gospel. In the Fourth Gospel this prep. figures prominently in denoting the relation of the Son to the Father, where “is from [beside]” (Jn. 6:46; 7:29; 9:33) means “came from [beside]” (Jn. 16:27 f.; 17:8). Elsewhere in John, some have found associated with para the doctrines of the eternal generation of the Son (monogenous para patros, Jn. 1:14) and the eternal procession of the Spirit (to pneuma tēs alētheias ho para tou patros ekporeuetai, Jn. 15:26). It is, however, unlikely that either verse supports this particular interpretation. Etymologically monogenēs is associated not with begetting (gennaomai) but with existence (gignomai). It means “of sole descent” (F. Büchsel, monogenēs, TDNT IV 738), referring to the only child in a family, a meaning attested in secular Gk. literature (e.g., Hesiod, Works, 376), the LXX (e.g., Jdg. 11:34; Tob. 3:15) and other Jewish literature (e.g., Josephus, Ant. 1, 222; 5, 264), and the NT (Lk. 7:12; 8:42; 9:38). From the personal application of monogenēs to “the only member of a kin” there developed a non-familial and (sometimes) non-personal use in reference to “the only member of a kind” (unicus, “sole”, “unique”; cf. monos, “alone” and genos, “species”). But in Johannine usage the conjunction of monogenēs and h̄yios (Jn. 3:16, 18; 1 Jn. 4:9) shows that it is not the personal uniqueness of Jesus in itself that John is emphasizing but his being “of sole descent” as the Son of God. He is without spiritual siblings. No one else can lay claim to the title Son of God in the sense in which it applies to Christ. It seems that the impulse to render monogenēs by unigenitus (as in the comparatively late Greek creeds translated into Latin) rather than by unicus (as in the earlier Latin renderings) arose from christological dispute and in particular the desire to establish from Scripture the doctrine of the generation of the Son by and from the Father (see F. J. A. Hort, Two Dissertations, 1876, 48–53). In Jn. 1:14, then, para patros following h̄os monogenous is equivalent not to tou ontos ek patros but to tou exerchomenou (or exelthontos) para patros (cf. Jn. 16:27 f.; 17:8), “[the glory of an only Son] coming from the Father.” It is the Son’s mission, not his eternal generation, that may be traced back (cf. para) to God the Father. (It is the context, and not the preposition itself that has theological implications; not only Jesus [Jn. 9:33] came “from God” [para theou], but John also [Jn. 1:6].)

Similarly in Jn. 15:26 it is not inter-trinitarian relations that John is discussing but Christ’s sending of the Spirit from the presence of the Father. (i) Although ekporeuetai could imply either an emanation from a divine source or a procession on a mission, only ek tou patros would be appropriate to denote an eternal procession from the being of the Father (as the creeds testify, which read to ek tou patros ekporeuomenon – a combination of Jn. 15:26 and 1 Cor. 2:12, to pneuma to ek tou theou). Compare Rev. 22:1, where the river of the water of life is described as flowing from (ekporeuomenon ek) the throne of God and of the Lamb. (ii) para tou patros is unlikely to bear two different senses in successive parallel statements. (iii) Following pempō and preceding martyrēsei, the verb ekporeuetai should probably be taken as a futuristic (not a timeless) present. (iv) Just as Jesus was sent by God and therefore could be said to have come forth from him (Jn. 8:42), so the Spirit would be sent by the Father (Jn. 14:26) and therefore could be said to proceed from him (Jn. 15:26). (v) In the context, with its emphasis on the truth of the Spirit’s witness to Christ (Jn. 15:26b), it would hardly be necessary for John to have indicated the eternal mode of the Spirit’s personal and essential subsistence. For a defence of the view that interprets the verse as relating to “the procession of the Spirit”, see M. J. Lagrange, Évangile selon Saint Jean, 1948, 413.

M. peri

The basic, local sense of peri is “around” or “encircling” (Lat. circum) (as in Acts 22:6). In its derived, figurative meanings, it designates a centre of activity, an object around which an action or a state revolves. Thus hoi peri ton Paulon (Acts 13:13, “Paul and his companions”) marks out the apostle as a sun with several satellites. Standing absolutely at the beginning of a sentence, peri (de) means “(now) concerning” (for parallels in the papyri, see Moulton-Milligan, 504) and marks a new section of thought (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:1, 25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1), a point of importance for the reconstruction of the Corinthian letter to Paul which he answers in 1 Cor. 7–16. On the partially overlapping functions of peri and hyper (e.g., Heb. 5:1, 3), see above I. B. 1. (f).

Generally the LXX renders Heb. ḥaṭṭa’î (which may mean “sin”, “sacrifice for sin”, or “sacrificial victim”) by peri hamartias (e.g., Lev. 7:37; 16:5; Ps. 39:7) or, less commonly, by to (or ta) peri tēs hamartias (Lev. 6:23; 14:19). With the abbreviated phrase peri hamartias one should understand to (dōron), “the offering (that relates to sin)”. In Heb. 10:6, 8 (citing Ps. 39:7, LXX) and probably in Heb. 13:11 (cf. Lev. 16:27) this phrase means “sin-offering”. It is possible that the plural peri (tōn) hamartiōn has this sense in Heb. 5:3 (note the double peri), but not in Heb. 10:18, 26; 1 Pet. 3:18; 1 Jn. 2:2 (where the phrase is dependent on a noun). In Rom. 8:3 peri hamartias could mean “in reference to sin” (= “to atone for sin,” Twentieth Century New Testament; “to deal with sin”, Weymouth), but, given OT usage, the rendering “as a sacrifice for sin” (NEB; similarly RV) seems more apposite (see further S. Lyonnet and L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice, AnBib 48, 1970, 194, 212, 249 f.).

N. pros

In cl. Gk. pros was regularly followed by three cases, but in the NT there is only one instance of the gen. (Acts 27:34; and only 23 in the LXX) and 6 with the dat., compared with 679 instances with the acc. (Moulton, Grammar, I, 106). In its basic spatial sense pros denotes actual motion or literal direction (e.g., Matt. 26:57; 1 Thess. 3:6), but the developed sense of mental direction or tendency followed naturally, referring to relationships that are friendly (e.g., Jn. 6:37 bis; 2 Cor. 3:16; Gal. 6:10; Eph. 3:14) or hostile (e.g., 1 Cor. 6:1; Col. 2:23). In turn, this notion of psychological orientation led to the use of pros to express the ideas of estimation, “in view of” (Matt. 19:8), purpose, “with a view to” (1 Cor. 10:11), conformity, “in accordance with” (Lk. 12:47; 2 Cor. 5:10; Eph. 4:14) and reference (Lk. 18:1; Gal. 2:14; Heb. 1:7). On the relation between pros and eis, see above II. D. 1 (a).

1. Jn. 1:1b. In itself Jn. 1:1a (“in the beginning the Word already existed”) speaks only of the pre-temporality or supra-temporality of the Logos, but by his conjunction of en archē and ēn John clearly implies the eternal pre-existence of the Word whose true sphere was not time but eternity. Having defined the relation of the Word to time, John specifies his relation to the Father: “The Word was pros ton theon.” There seem to be three alternatives with respect to the meaning of pros in this verse. First, after logos, ēn pros could conceivably mean “spoke to”. In questioning the customary translations “near” or “with” for pros, C. Masson argues that since a “word” is spoken to a person, one might expect after v. 1a an answer to the question “To whom was the word spoken?” (pros with the acc., ēn pros ton theon) rather than “Where was the Word?” (para with the dat., ēn para tō theō). (“Pour une traduction nouvelle de Jean 1:1b et 2,” Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 98, 1965, 376–381). Masson believes that his rendering of 1:1b, “et la Parole parlait (s’adressait) à Dieu”, appropriately reflects the dynamic nature of the Word. “Thus, for faith, ‘in the beginning’ there is not an unknown and unknowable God, some indeterminate and nameless Being, enveloped by night and by silence; there is the God who speaks and whose Word in time, in creation and in redemption is the eternal Word” (ibid., p. 381). This rendering (“the Word spoke to God”) was suggested earlier by F. C. Burkitt, Church and Gnosis, 1932, 95. However, it is just as reasonable to think that 1:1b answers the question “What was the eternal relationship of the Logos to the Father?” (cf. 1 Jn. 1:2). Moreover, Masson is scarcely justified in filling out the meaning of ēn pros on the basis of an accompanying substantive (ho logos) that here functions as a proper noun.

A second alternative is to take pros with the acc. as equivalent to para with the dat. after einai, denoting position: “with” (thus e.g. Funk, § 239 (1); C. F. D. Moule, Idiom-Book, 52 f.; N. Turner in Moulton, Grammar, III, 274). The prep. does not imply any movement or action on the part of the Logos in his relation to the Father. Support for this view may be found in the NT parallels where pros with the acc., often following the verb einai, denotes not linear motion but punctiliar rest (Matt. 26:18, 55 v.l.; Mk. 6:3 (= Matt. 13:56); 9:19 (= Lk. 9:41 but Matt. 17:17 has meth’ hymōn); 14:49; 1 Cor. 16:6 f.; 2 Cor. 5:8; 11:9; Gal. 1:18; 4:18, 20; Phil. 1:26; 1 Thess. 3:4; 2 Thess. 2:5; 3:10; Phlm. 13; Heb. 4:13; 1 Jn. 1:2). This usage reflects (i) the blurring of the notions of movement and rest in Hel. Gk.; (ii) the reduction of the dat. case and the extension of the acc. case in Hel. Gk.; (iii) “an extension of many classical usages, particularly in such phrases as enthymeisthai pros hauton" (G. R. Driver, cited in Moulton, Grammar, II, 467), rather than Aramaic influence (e.g., C. F. Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel, 1922, 29, suggests that the translator of an Aramaic original, finding Aram. l'wāt, rendered it by pros rather than para under the influence of the more common use of the Aram. prep., viz. to express motion towards). But, as I. de la Potterie has pointed out ("L'emploi dynamique de eis dans Saint Jean et ses incidences théologiques", Bib. 43, 1962, 379), elsewhere John uses para tini to express the proximity of one person to another (Jn. 1:39; 4:40; 8:38; 14:17, 23, 25; 19:25; cf. 14:23; note also meta tinos in Jn. 3:22, 25 f. etc.) or the nearness of the Son to the Father (Jn. 8:38; 17:5), never pros tina.

On a third view, the sense is: "the Word was (in active communion) with the Father." This seems to be the import of John's statement, whether or not pros bears a dynamic sense, for when pros describes a relationship between persons it must connote personal intercourse rather than simply spatial juxtaposition or personal accompaniment. Used of divine persons, the prep. points to eternal intercommunion. But L. M. Dewailly ("'La Parole parlait à Dieu'?", Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 100, 1967, 128) rightly warns against discovering in Jn. 1:1b "all the patristic and conciliar christology which was much later attached to it, still less the speculation of Eastern or Western traditions concerning the existential (subsistentes) relations." Some commentators seem to have erred here. J. A. Bengel, for example, claims that "pros . . . denotes a perpetual, as it were, tendency of the Son to the Father in the unity of essence" (Gnomon of the New Testament, ET 1863, II, 234). H. Alford alleges that "both the inner substantial union, and the distinct personality of the logos are here (in 1:1b) asserted" (The Greek Testament, 1958 revision by E. F. Harrison, I, 681). And while I. de la Potterie (loc. cit., 381 n. 3) believes that the Son's "filiation" is expressed by the Johannine formula pros ton theon, he rejects the view of J. Isaac (La Révélation Progressive des Personnes Divines, 1960, 80) that the mutual belonging (appartenance) or immanence of the Father and Son is indicated, since this would presuppose that pros had both a static and a dynamic sense at the same time.

2. 2 Cor. 5:8. In 2 Cor. 5:6 Paul states that as long as he continued to dwell in a mortal body he was (spatially) absent from the Lord. Because he knew (eidotes) this, he preferred to leave his present form of embodiment and take up residence pros ton kyrion, "with (or, in the presence of) the Lord". The prep. phrase may simply be equivalent to emprosthen tou kyriou or para iō kyriō, for in itself the prep. pros contains no idea of reciprocal action. On the other hand, if the believer's future destiny may be summed up in the phrase endēmein pros ton kyrion ("dwelling in the company of the Lord") (= syn Christō einai, "being with Christ," Phil. 1:23), something more must be signified than an impassive spatial proximity to Christ. As in Jn. 1:1b, where a pre-temporal divine relationship is being affirmed, so in 2 Cor. 5:8, where an eternal human-divine relationship is being depicted, pros implies (rather than expresses) dynamic interpersonal communion, a settled mutual fellowship. A. T. Robertson (Grammar, 625) comments: "It is the face-to-face converse with the Lord that Paul has in mind", pros being "employed for living relationship, intimate converse." Similarly W. Grundmann, dēmos, TDNT II 64.

3. 1 Jn. 5:16 f. In the context these two verses identify one prayer of intercession that is "according to God's will" and therefore will be answered (1 Jn. 5:14 ff.; cf.

3:21 f.), viz. prayer for a fellow-believer who has sinned. But John places one restriction on the scope of such prayer: he does not counsel intercession for a person who has committed a sin pros thanaton, since the granting of pardon or life (zōēn, v. 16) to such a person would be contrary to God's will. The prep. phrase may be rendered either "tending to death" or "issuing in death". In one case, death is the natural but not necessary outcome; in the other, death is the actual result or a necessary consequence. It is difficult to understand "life" and "death" as referring to eternal life and eternal death, since (i) eternal life could scarcely be said to be given to an erring believer as a result of vicarious intercession, and (ii) John is unlikely to have countenanced the idea of sins that do not "tend towards" or "result in" eternal death. While the "death" could be that of exclusion from the Christian community (= excommunication; cf. Num. 15:30 f.), it is better understood as physical death, regarded as a penalty administered not by man (cf. Num. 18:22; Deut. 22:25 f.) but by God (as in 1 Cor. 11:30–32; cf. Acts 5:1–10), and accordingly pros will denote not tendency but result (as in Jn. 11:4, "this illness will not end in death", ouk estin pros thanaton). (That pros is consecutive in 1 Jn. 5:16 f. is recognized by Arndt, 717 s.v. pros III, 3b; B. Reicke pros, TNDT VI 725.) On this view the apostle is encouraging intercession for any believer whose sin has not met with immediate divine judgment. As a result of intercessory prayer God will grant such a person the boon of further physical life and of renewed spiritual life – in spite of his open or wilful sin (such as may be seen, idē, v. 16a). But he discourages intercession for any believer who has experienced divine judgment in the form of death. Such prayer for the dead would be contrary to God's will. As for the identification of the "sin that leads to death", it may be: (i) the open and deliberate rejection of Christ, the "anti-christian" denial of the incarnation or messiahship of Jesus (1 Jn. 2:22; 4:2 f.; 2 Jn. 7); in other words, apostasy, as evidenced in the promulgation of heretical doctrine (1 Jn. 2:18–27; cf. Heb. 6:4–8); (ii) blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Mk. 3:28–30); (iii) deliberate sin (cf. Heb. 10:26–31), sin performed "with a high hand" (Num. 15:30 f.), such as premeditated murder or persistent hatred.

O. syn

1. Its Relation to meta. In Attic Gk. syn meant "including" and "with the aid of" and meta "(in company) with", but in Hel. Gk. they are virtually synonymous (for LXX usage see M. Johannesson, Präpositionen, 1926, 202–212). syn has not survived in modern demotic Gk. (where me with the acc. means "with") and is only rarely used in the so-called "purist" language (where meta with the gen. is found). Of the 127 NT uses of syn, 75 are in Lk.-Acts (Morgenthaler, 145). As a NT prep. meta (with the gen.) is more common (364 uses) than syn, but, unlike syn, is rarely used in compound verbs. Both preps. are used in connexion with Christian discipleship, fellowship meals and eschatology (W. Grundmann, syn - meta with the Genitive, TDNT VII 794–797).

In spite of the general interchangeability of the two preps., it is significant that Paul regularly ends his letters with the prayer that grace be with (meta, never syn) his addressees, whereas he depicts the Christian life as one of identification with Christ and the Christian's destiny as "being with Christ" (syn, not meta, in both cases). This would suggest that, of the two preps., syn was the more suited to express intimate personal union (e.g., Col. 3:4), and meta the more suited to denote close association or attendant circumstances (e.g., 1 Thess. 3:13).

2. einai syn Christō in Paul. Paul's distinctive description of Christian existence is embodied in the phrase einai en Christō (e.g., 2 Cor. 5:17). There is no evidence in the Pauline corpus that death removes the Christian from his en Christō incorporation: this persists at and after death, as the expression hoi nekroi en Christō ("the dead [who are] in Christ", 1 Thess. 4:16; not "those who died in Christ" = hoi koimēthentes en Christō, 1 Cor. 15:18) would indicate. When the believer dies, there is added to en Christō corporeity a personal and "spatial" syn Christō dimension (Phil. 1:23). When used to indicate a relation between two persons known to and esteemed by each other, the prep. syn must signify more than mere spatial juxtaposition (as if two objects were being related) and even more than co-existence (as if two persons were being related who were either unacquainted or unfriendly). The destiny of believers after death or after the parousia (syn kyriō einai, 1 Thess. 4:17; syn Christō einai, Phil. 1:23) is not simply spatial proximity to Christ but active communion with Christ. G. A. Deissmann mentions a graffito from Alexandria, perhaps of the Imperial period, where a deceased person is addressed thus: "I would that I were soon in fellowship with you" (syn soi einai) (Light from the Ancient East, ET 1927, 303 n. 1). This parallel to the Pauline use of syn is all the more impressive when one recalls that the person to whose presence the Christian departs at death is not dead but alive. Only if Christ had not risen from the grave could Paul have spoken of departed saints as hoi kekoimēmenoi syn Christō ("those who have fallen asleep with Christ"), syn Christō einai (never used of the earthly experience of Christians), primarily an individual and active experience, is not related to en Christō einai, essentially a corporate and passive experience, by succession, since hoi nekroi remain en Christō (1 Thess. 4:16). The difference between "the dead in Christ" and living Christians is not in their status (en Christō in both cases), but in the quality of their fellowship with Christ and the degree of their proximity to Christ. J. Dupont has distinguished two phases in Paul's use of the syn Christō concept. In 1 Thess. 4:17 (and 5:10) "being (or living) with the Lord" emphasizes believers' sharing in the eschatological blessings of the Kingdom enjoyed by Christ since his resurrection, whereas in Phil. 1:23 ("being with Christ") and 2 Cor. 5:8 ("dwelling with the Lord") the emphasis falls on intimate fellowship with the King in the Kingdom (SYN CHRISTŌ, 1952, 39–47, 95 f., 112–115, 170–173, 186 f.).

For a discussion of the compounds in syn- which develop the syn Christō formula, see W. Grundmann, TDNT VII 786–794; on the general theme of identification with Christ, see R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ, 1967.

III SPECIAL PROBLEMS

A. Prepositions with baptizō

1. hyper (1 Cor. 15:29, bis). To be satisfactory, any proposed interpretation of this crux interpretum must meet two requirements: (a) hyper should not be given a sense unparalleled in the Greek Bible (since the customary meanings of the preposition afford a suitable sense); (b) the resultant meaning of the verse should contribute to Paul's argument in the chapter. It is highly improbable, for example, (a) that hyper is local (“over [the graves of] the dead”), or means “in memory of” or “out of respect for”; (b) that hoi baptizomenoi refers to all new converts who were, by their baptismal incorporation into the church, filling up the ranks left depleted by Christian martyrs (hoi nekroi). M. Raeder gives hyper a final sense: converts to Christianity were having themselves baptized in order to be united with their departed relatives and friends at the resurrection (“Vikariatstaufe in 1 Kor. 15:29?” ZNW 46, 1955, 258–260). More probably, some baptized Corinthians who had a semi-magical view of baptism were being rebaptized vicariously for certain deceased Corinthians (the articular tōn nekron presents no difficulty for this view) who were thought to be at a disadvantage because they had not been baptized before being overtaken by death. On this interpretation Paul is using an ad hominem argument (as also in vv. 30–32, where he refers to his apostolic peril and labour) in support of a conclusion already established (viz. that the dead in Christ will rise) and is appealing to an aberrant practice (otherwise unknown to us in the first century), without giving it his approval. (That Paul could argue e concessis is evident from 1 Cor. 8:10; cf. 10:20 f.) The verse may be paraphrased thus: “Otherwise [viz. if there is no resurrection of the Christian dead] what will those people achieve by way of advantage who are going to the trouble of having themselves baptized in place of the dead?” A close parallel to this sense of hyper (“in place of”) is afforded by Dion. Hal. 8: additional soldiers were enrolled in the place of (hyper) those who were dying in battle. For the history of the interpretation of this verse, see M. Rissi, Die Taufe für die Toten, 1962; and cf. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament, 1962, 185–192; C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 362 ff.

2. hypo. There are 7 instances of baptizesthai hypo in the NT (all in the Synoptic gospels) in which the prep. points to the personal agent administering the rite of water baptism (Matt. 3:6 [= Mk. 1:5], 13, 14; Mk. 1:9; Lk. 3:7; 7:30). It was probably John the Baptist’s personal administration of the rite that in part accounted for his title, ho baptistēs or ho baptizōn (proselytes immersed themselves in the presence of two or [later] three rabbis who constituted a court).

3. eis. (a) Matt. 3:11 and Acts 2:38. The causal sense of the prep. in these verses has been vigorously defended by A. T. Robertson (Grammar, 389, 592; Word Pictures in the New Testament, III [1930], 35 f.) and J. R. Mantey (A Manual Grammar of the Greek New Testament, 1927, 104; “The Causal Use of Eis in the New Testament”, JBL 70, 1951, 45–48; “On Causal Eis Again”, ibid., 309–311, replying to the rejoinder of R. Marcus, “On Causal Eis”, ibid., 129 f.; and cf. E. J. Goodspeed’s rendering, “in token of your repentance”). Mantey has not adduced any convincing example from extra-biblical Hel. Gk., where eis expresses “immediate and direct cause”, while in Gen. 4:23 eis (bis) = l^e = “regarding, in view of” (see BDB, 514, s.v. 5 f., but cf. 5 g.). In Matt. 3:11 eis may be telic (“with a view to, in order to obtain”), consecutive (“resulting in”), or possibly even temporal (eis = en = “at, upon”; cf. Weymouth, “on a profession of repentance,” but see his note; and Matt. 3:6 where the participle exhomologoumenoi suggests the simultaneity of baptism and confession of sin [= repentance]). However, since elsewhere John’s baptism is termed a “baptism of (= relating to, marked by) repentance”, “a repentance baptism” (Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:3; Acts 13:24; 19:4), eis may simply mean “in relation or reference to.” Similarly, in Acts 2:38 forgiveness of sin could be the purpose of repentance and baptism (final or telic eis) (cf. 1 Pet. 3:21) or their outcome (ec-batic or consecutive eis), or else forgiveness is being regarded as conceptually (but not necessarily chronologically) coincident with baptism (eis = temporal en) or as connected with baptism (referential eis). It is significant that A. Oepke, who notes an occasional causal eis in the NT, finds eis to be final in both Matt. 3:11 and Acts 2:38 (eis, TDNT II 429).

(b) Incorporation into the one Body of Christ is the purpose and effect (eis, “so as to form”) of “baptism in the Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:13); or the baptized may be conceived of as entering into (local eis) the Body of Christ that already exists (see E. Percy, Der Leib Christi, 1942, 15 ff.). Identification with Moses or allegiance to him as leader was the goal and outcome (eis) of the Israelite submission to baptism (ebaptisanto, 1 Cor. 10:2 v.l.). To be baptized “into the death of” Christ Jesus (Rom. 6:3b) is to participate in all of the saving benefits of “his death to sin” (Rom. 6:10), or to submit to a water-baptism that relates to his death. In Mk. 1:9 eis ton Iordanēn may denote the element into which the baptizand was plunged, but more probably eis = local en.

(c) Baptism eis to onoma (tinōs). Three principal views have been taken of this prep. phrase. They are mentioned here in descending order of probability. First, it may denote a transference of ownership, as when money is paid “(in)to the account of” a certain individual or is credited “to the name of” someone (thus W. Heitmüller, Im Namen Jesu, FRLANT 1, 2, 1903, 100 ff., especially 127). On this understanding, the person being baptized passes into the possession of the Triune God (Matt. 28:19) or the Lord Jesus (Acts 8:16; 19:5; cf. 1 Cor. 1:13, 15 where baptism into Paul’s name is equated with belonging to Paul, 1:12) and comes under his control and protection (Arndt, 575 s.v. onoma I. 4. c. beta). G. Delling, on the other hand, argues that since the salvific work of Jesus is inextricably linked to his name, “to baptize into the name of the Lord Jesus” means to endow a person, through baptism, with the benefits of the salvation accomplished by Jesus Christ (Die Zueignung des Heils in der Taufe, 1961). A third interpretation, recently defended by L. Hartman (“‘Into the Name of Jesus’. A Suggestion Concerning the Earliest Meaning of the Phrase”, NTS 20, 1973–4; 432–440; “Baptism ‘Into the Name of Jesus’ and Early Christology. Some Tentative Considerations,” StTh 28, 1974, 21–48), traces the origin of the phrase eis to onoma to the Heb. l’sēm or Aram. l’sūm, often used in the Mishnah and Talmud with the meaning “with reference to,” denoting the fundamental reference or purpose of some thing, rite or action. Baptism “with respect to” Jesus was a “Jesus baptism”, which distinguished Christian baptism from other rites, especially John’s baptism. According to Hartman, the “high” christology which the phrase presupposes may have used Son of man categories but not the actual title “Son of man.”

(d) eis Christon (Iēsoun) (Rom. 6:3a; Gal. 3:27) is generally taken to be brachylogy for “into the Body of Christ” (i.e. the church, so that to be baptized into Christ = to put on Christ (Gal. 3:27b) = to be in Christ (Gal. 3:28)), or “into the name of Christ” (thus Arndt, 131 s.v. baptizō 2. b. beta; F. Prat, The Theology of Saint Paul, ET, 1945, II, 462–466, who distinguishes the mystical Christ [e.g. Gal. 3:27] from the physical Christ [e.g. Acts 8:16]; M. Barth, Die Taufe – Ein Sakrament?, 1951, 223–226), but the phrase may also describe the believer’s entry into (local eis) personal union and communion with Christ (“into fellowship with Christ”). But E. de W. Burton renders the phrase “with reference to Christ”, which he takes to mean “with mention or confession of” the name of Christ (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, 1921, 203–205; similarly B. N. Kaye, “Baptizein eis with Special Reference to Romans 6”, in Studia Evangelica, VI [ed. E. A. Livingstone], 1973, 281–286, who stresses the need for baptizein eis to have the same meaning in Rom. 6:3a and 3b).

4. en. Generally this has a local sense when used with baptizō: in the (river) Jordan (Matt. 3:6; Mk. 1:5 [= eis ton Iordanēn, 1:9], in the desert (Mk. 1:4), in Aenon (Jn. 3:23), in the cloud and in the sea (1 Cor. 10:2). en hydati denotes the element in which the baptized were “immersed” or with which they were “drenched” (Matt. 3:11; Jn. 1:26, 31, 33; Acts 11:16; cf. the simple dative hydati in Mk. 1:8 v.l.; Lk. 3:16; Acts 1:5; 11:16). So also with the phrase (en) pneumati (hagiō), which is generally contrasted with (en) hydati (Matt. 3:12; Mk. 1:8 v.l.; Lk. 3:16; Jn. 1:33; Acts 1:5; 11:16): believers are either immersed “in” the Spirit, or drenched “with” the Spirit (for a defence of the latter view, see I. H. Marshall, “The Meaning of the Verb ‘to baptize’”, EQ 45, 1973, 130–140). Personal agency cannot be expressed simply by pneumati (cf. Funk, § 195). For several reasons it seems probable that en heni pneumati in 1 Cor. 12:13 means not “by one Spirit” but “in (or with) one Spirit”. (a) Elsewhere hypo expresses personal agency with baptizō (see above, III. A. 2.). (b) There is no certain instance of an instrumental en with baptizō: in the other examples of en pneumati, the parallel with en hydati dictates that en should mean “in” or “with” and not “by (means of)”, denoting the “sphere” or “material” but not the agent (but for instrumental en denoting personal agency, see Matt. 9:34; 12:24, 28; Acts 17:31 [cf. 4:12]; Phil. 4:13). (c) In the logia of John the Baptist regarding “Spirit-baptism”, it is always Jesus who is the baptizer, never the Spirit. Accordingly in 1 Cor. 12:13, the agent should be taken as implied (viz. Jesus Christ). (d) In the one place Paul uses en with baptizō (1 Cor. 10:2), the prep. is local in sense (“in the cloud and in the sea”). (e) The following phrase “we were all given one Spirit to drink” (1 Cor. 12:13b) suggests an inward participation in the Spirit to which a preceding outward “immersion in the Spirit” would correspond. The Spirit is both around (v. 13a) and within (v. 13b; cf. Eph. 5:18). (f) The parallel en heni pneumati in Eph. 2:18 cannot be an instrumental use of en, since di’ autou (= Christ) precedes (but cf. Eph. 3:5; 4:30). However en tō heni pneumati in 1 Cor. 12:9 is undoubtedly instrumental in sense, in light of the preceding dia tou pneumatōs (1 Cor. 12:8; cf. vv. 7, 8b, 11). To deny that en is instrumental in 1 Cor. 12:13 is not, of course, to deny the personality of the Spirit, but simply to recognize that baptizō need not always mean “to baptize in water”, but may be used metaphorically of immersion, inundation or deluging (see Arndt 131 s.v. baptizō 3. c).

5. en/epi tō onomati. Some commentators find no distinction between the three phrases eis to onoma, en tō onomati and epi tō onomati after baptizō, (e.g., S. New, “The Name, Baptism, and the Laying on of Hands”, in Vol. V of The Beginnings of Christianity [ed. K. Lake and H. J. Cadbury] 1966 reprint [= 1933], 123 n. 3), while others distinguish eis (= Hebrew ל, “with regard to”) both from en (= Hebrew ב; “on the authority of”) and from epi (“resting upon” or “devoted to” the name [= person] of Christ) (e.g., R. Abba, “Name,” IDB, III, 507a). Probably en tō onomati (Acts 10:48; cf. 2:38 v.l.) and epi tō onomati (Acts 2:38) are identical in sense (“at, in the name”) referring either to the candidate’s confession of faith in the name of Jesus Christ (cf. Acts 22:16) or to the administrant’s acting on the authority of Christ or his invocation of the name of Jesus during the baptismal rite (cf. Arndt, 287, s.v. epi II. 3). These two prep. phrases would then describe the administration or operation of the rite, and eis to onoma its nature or goal (on which see above, III. A. 3. c.).

B. Prepositions with pisteuō (and pistis)

For a convenient analysis of the meaning of pisteuō and pistis in cl. Gk., the LXX, and the Pseudepigrapha, see E. de W. Burton, Galatians, 1921, 475–478. A chart that classifies NT uses of pisteuō (when it is not used absolutely and does not mean “entrust”) may be found in Moulton, Grammar, I, 68 n. 2, although some of the statistics mentioned below differ slightly.

Apart from the many instances where pisteuō is used absolutely (a rare use in the LXX – Isa. 7:9; 28:16), either in a religious sense (“have faith”, e.g. Mk. 5:36; 9:23 f.; 2 Cor. 4:13; or “have faith [in Christ]”, e.g., Jn. 3:18b; Acts 2:44; 2 Thess. 1:10) or in a non-religious sense (“give credence”, e.g., Mk. 13:21; Lk. 22:67), there are numerous constructions found with this verb in the NT.

1. The non-prep. constructions are:

(a) Acc. of the thing, where the verb means “believe”, “be convinced of” (Jn. 11:26b; 1 Cor. 11:18; 13:7; 1 Jn. 4:16) or “entrust” (Lk. 16:11; and with the “retained accus.” after a pass. Rom. 3:2; Gal. 2:7; 1 Thess. 2:4; 1 Tim. 1:11; Tit. 1:3) or acc. of the person, where the verb means “entrust” (Jn. 2:24).

(b) Acc. and infin. (Acts 8:37 v.l.; cf. Acts 15:11).

(c) Infin. (Rom. 14:2), where pisteuei means “has confidence” and/or “has [sufficiently strong] faith (to eat)”.

(d) hoti (= Heb. he'mîn kî), with the verb signifying “believe that”, “be convinced that” (Lk. 1:45; Jn. 20:31a; Rom. 6:8; 10:9; 1 Thess. 4:14; Jas. 2:19a).

(e) Dat. with hoti following (Jn. 4:21; Acts 27:25).

(f) Dat. (= Heb. he'mîn l' or b'; see M. Johannesson, Präpositionen, I, 1910, 60 f.) of the thing believed (Lk. 1:20; Jn. 4:50; Acts 24:14) or the person believed. In the latter category, the sense of pisteuō will range from “give credence to (the testimony of)” men or God (e.g., Mk. 11:31; Jn. 6:30; Acts 8:12; 26:27a; 1 Jn. 5:10b) to “entrust oneself to” God (Acts 16:34; Tit. 3:8) or Christ (e.g., Jn. 8:31; 2 Tim. 1:12).

2. The prep. constructions that follow pisteuō (and pistis) are, in ascending order of frequency:

(a) peri with hoti following (Jn. 9:18; cf. Plut., Luc. 19, 4; Josephus, Ant. 14, 267).

(b) pros. In Phlm. 5 both prep. phrases (pros ton kyrion Iēsoun and eis pantas tous hagiou) probably refer to both pistin (which must therefore signify “fidelity” rather than “[saving] faith”) and agapēn. Even if the structure is chiasmic (ABBA), pros modifies pistin. The phrase pros ton theon depicts the object of pistis in 1 Thess. 1:8, although such a construction is rare in the LXX (4 Macc. 15:24; 16:22). pros never follows pisteuō in biblical Gk.

(c) dia. di' autou (or di' hōn) is found following pisteuō (Jn. 1:7, of John the Baptist; 1 Cor. 3:5, of Paul and Apollos) with Christ probably as the object of faith, and following pistis (Acts 3:16, probably of Jesus) and pistos (tous di' autou pistous eis theon, 1 Pet. 1:21a, certainly of Jesus; on this verse see F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter. I. 1–II. 17, 1898, 81–84) with God as the object of faith. This prep. phrase therefore expresses the human or divine instrument by which persons come to faith in Christ or God.

(d) en. Each of the three possible instances is contested. It is unlikely that pisteuete is absolute in Mk. 1:15, with en meaning “in the sphere of” (A. Deissmann, Die neutestamentliche Formel “In Christo Jesu”, 1892, 46 f.; and note J. H. Moulton’s change of mind on the matter, Grammar, I, 67 f.; II, 464) since there are several LXX instances (Jer. 12:6; Pss. 77:22; cf. 77:32; 105:12; Dan. 6:24, Theod.) in which en after pisteuō denotes the object of faith. Nor should en be rendered “on the basis of”. The verse may be translated “believe (in) the Good News”. P. F. Regard (Prépositions, 339) paraphrases thus: believe “in the truth of the substance of the Gospel.” In Eph. 1:13 en hō should be construed with esphragisthēte, not pisteusantes. Finally, the uncertainty in Jn. 3:15 is textual (p⁷⁵ B al. read en autō after pas ho pisteuōn, but other MSS read ep’ autō, eis auton, or ep’ auton) and exegetical (en autō may be construed with what precedes or what follows). Probably en autō should be read and the phrase should be taken with hina . . . echē zōēn aiōnion (cf. Jn. 5:39; 16:33 and note that John generally uses eis with pisteuō): “that everyone who believes might in him have eternal life”.

In the 4 instances where en is to be construed with pistis (Eph. 1:15; Col. 1:4; 1 Tim. 3:13; 2 Tim. 3:15; but not Rom. 3:25 and probably not Gal. 3:26), the prep. phrase is as likely to mark out the sphere or realm in which faith was operative and evident as to specify the actual object of faith. For example, Col. 1:4 may be rendered “your faith (that rests) in Christ Jesus” (= pistis eis Christon = pistis Christou) or “your faith experienced in fellowship with Christ Jesus”.

(e) epi with dat. Four times this construction (with pisteuō) is used with a personal object (Rom. 9:33; 10:11; 1 Pet. 2:6 [these three verses being citations of Isa. 28:16]; 1 Tim. 1:16; see also the textual variants in Mt. 27:42 v.l.; Jn. 3:15 v.l.), once with an impersonal object (Lk. 24:25). In the former cases, pisteuō epi denotes the placing of one’s reliance upon a person who affords a firm support or a solid foundation.

(f) epi with acc. The idea of metaphorical movement that is implied in the 7 instances that occur with pisteuō (Matt. 27:42; Acts 9:42; 11:17; 16:31; 22:19; Rom. 4:5, 24; cf. Wis. 12:2) and the one example with pistis (Heb. 6:1) may derive from the notion of turning away from former objects of devotion that brought disappointment to a new personal object of faith in whom one has confidence.

(g) eis with acc. Examples of this construction with pisteuō, which is modelled on the Heb. he’emîn b^e (not the Gk. epistrepō epi or pros), are lacking in cl. Gk. and the LXX (but see Sir. 38:31). In the NT it is a characteristically Johannine idiom, with only 8 of the 45 NT uses being found outside the Fourth Gospel and 1 Jn. (viz., Matt. 18:6; Acts 10:43; 14:23; 19:4 (?); Rom. 10:14; Gal. 2:16; Phil. 1:29; 1 Pet. 1:8; and note Mk. 9:42 v.l.). epi never follows pisteuō in the Johannine corpus, but elsewhere it is more frequently used (12 times) than eis (8 times). There is no doubt that occasionally John uses the dat. with the same sense as eis with the acc. (viz. Jn. 5:24, 38; 8:31; cf. 8:30, eis auton), but it ought not to be assumed that the two constructions are completely interchangeable, for pisteuō with the dat. of the person believed sometimes means simply “give intellectual credence to” (Jn. 4:21; 5:46 bis, 47 bis; 8:45 f.; 10:37, 38a; 14:11a, 14:11b v.l.), a meaning pisteuō eis never bears (compare Jn. 6:29 and 6:30) (but see per contra, R. Bultmann, pisteuō, TDNT VI 203 and n. 221, 210 f.). Furthermore it is clear that for John pisteuō eis is intimately connected with erchomai eis (Jn. 5:40; 6:35, 37, 44 f., 65; 7:37) and pisteuō eis to onoma (Jn. 1:12; 2:23; 3:18; 1 Jn. 5:13; cf. 1 Jn. 3:23, tō onomati). This latter phrase probably means “believe in the person of” but it could possibly be related to the formula baptizō eis to onoma and imply a transfer of ownership, resulting in a new allegiance (but this view is scarcely possible in Jn. 2:23; cf. 2:24). But Jn. 3:18 shows that pisteuō eis to onoma may simply be a variant of pisteuō eis and that the absolute pisteuō may stand for either (see the discussion of C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953, 182–186).

In Gal. 2:16 it is apparent that pisteuō eis Christon Iēsoun = pistis Christou (see W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God, SBT 50, ET 1966, 10 f.). The objective genitive after pistis may stand in the place of (i) eis after pisteuō, and (ii) pistis eis (a phrase found in Acts 20:21; 24:24; Col. 2:5; cf. Acts 26:18; 1 Pet. 1:21b).

It follows that eis after pisteuō denotes, as a minimum, the object of faith (P. F. Regard, Prépositions, 341 f.) or the direction of faith (R. Schnackenburg, Baptism in the Thought of St. Paul, ET 1964, 23; cf. his Der Glaube im vierten Evangelium, 1937, 6–11). But more seems to be implied. pisteuō (or pistis) eis Christon depicts the committal of one’s self to the person of Christ, something more than an intellectual acceptance of the message of the gospel or a recognition of the truth about Christ (which may be expressed by pisteuō hoti or pisteuō with the dat.). But the two aspects are intimately related. Since the person of Christ is the essence of the message that is proclaimed and accepted, to accept the message concerning him is to accept him. pisteuō hoti naturally becomes pisteuō eis or epi, as Jn. 20:31 and Rom. 10:9–11 clearly establish. So then to eis auton (sc. Christon) pisteuein (Phil. 1:29) describes the Christian condition, the state in which the Christian lives, while entrance into that state is denoted by hoi pisteusantes (sc. eis Christon) (Acts 2:44; 4:32; 2 Thess. 1:10; cf. Gal. 2:16) (cf. W. H. P. Hatch, The Pauline Idea of Faith, 1917, 46).

3. Concluding Observations.

(a) As used in profane Gk., pisteuō (or pistis) with the dat. emphasized the element of intellectual apprehension or simple credence. The twofold moral emphasis in the Heb. use of he^hmin, viz. personal trust and confident reliance, is reflected in the Christian coinage of the phrases pisteuō eis (denoting personal trust; never found in the LXX) and pisteuō epi (with acc., denoting confidence, and found only in Wis. 12:2 in the LXX; with dat., denoting reliance). It is true that the dat. case was beginning to wane in the NT period (see above, I. B. 1 (a)) but this fact in itself cannot account for the coinage of these two prep. phrases. If no new connotation were intended by NT writers in using eis and epi after pisteuō, one might have expected en with the dat. after pisteuō to be far more frequent (it is found only in Mk. 1:15 – see above, III. B. 2. (d)), for one tendency of Hel. Gk. was for en to be added to the simple dat. case.

(b) Nowhere is pisteuō eis used with a human object of faith (note that in Gal. 5:10 egō pepoitha eis hymas means “I am confident with respect to [= in] you”; cf. 2 Cor. 8:22) and only once is the expressed object impersonal (1 Jn. 5:10c; but even here eis tēn martyrīan signifies God’s testimony concerning his Son; see also Jn. 12:36). In NT usage “believing” connotes the confident trust that an individual places in a divine person, not merely the simple credence he gives to verifiable facts. It involves not only recognition and acceptance of the truth but also adherence and allegiance to the Truth.

(c) The fact that God is (relatively speaking) so infrequently held up as the object of faith (only in Jn. 12:44c; 14:1a; Acts 16:34; Rom. 4:3, 5, 17, 24; Gal. 3:6; 1 Thess. 1:8; Tit. 3:8; Heb. 6:1; 1 Pet. 1:21; cf. Acts 11:17 D; Acts 13:12 D) and Christ so frequently, indicates that it is in Christ that God meets the individual in salvation. There are not two competing personal objects of human faith.
